Now, a crash course on self-driving car

■ Aim of Silicon Valley's online course is a faster path to employment in an emerging sector

San Francisco, Sept 14

Silicon Valley is creating a crash course in self-driving car technology to address a shortage of engineers with help from a startup in a different field: online education.

Nearly every major tech company, car company and ride services company, it seems, is developing or partnering with developers of self-driving technology from Googleparent Alphabet to Tesla Motors to General Motors and Uber Technologies, creating an insatiable demand for the people teaching the machines to think.

In about a year's time, a Lincoln sedan will be driving itself from Mountain View to

Google's self-driving car. Research firm C8 Insights has identified 33 corporations working on autonomous cars, including GM, Volvo, internet giants Baidu and Google

San Francisco, using software developed by 250 or so students enrolled at education start-up Udacity. If all goes according to plan.

Udacity bought the Lincoln already equipped with the digital interface needed in autonomous vehicles; students will write the code. Udacity's course, which costs $2,400 for three, 12-week terms, starts next month and was designed by a company co-founder Sebastian Thrun, who launched Google's driverless car programme.

EU rules look to unify digital market

Sept 14: Google may have to pay publishers for their content. Facebook might, too. WhatsApp could have to follow tougher telecom standards. A new set of rules expected to be unveiled by European Union officials on Wednesday is likely to put new pressure on American tech companies. Europe calls it consumer protection. Silicon Valley calls it protectionism.

In some ways, they are both right. In a decade of sluggish growth, local lawmakers assert that these proposed changes will bring together the region's national economies into a so-called single digital market.

The proposals would force some of the world's largest tech companies to comply with stringent competition, privacy and copyright rules. For many executives, such plans, which will still take years to come into effect and which will be subject to intense lobbying, feel like another round of protectionism.

And while Europe's policy makers balk at these claims, the fact that Google, Facebook and Microsoft, among others, will be the most affected by the digital revamp has again highlighted how much Europeans rely on American tech when using digital services. The plans to be announced by the Brussels-based European Commission.

Self-driving truck start-up Otto, recently acquired by Uber Technologies, an American company, and chip maker Nvidia contributed to Udacity's curriculum. "If you go through this curriculum, you are on the bleeding edge of self-driving cars," said Thrun. The aim of the programme is a faster path to employment in a new field, where the company is building a fleet of self-driving cars, according to jobs website Glassdoor. "I love people with MIT and Stanford degrees," Thrun said. But "there are a lot of people who can't make it to those institutions. There are entire generations of people who are equally smart and equally capable."

Yet the idea that a certificate from an online training programme would secure a job in one of the most difficult emerging technologies strikes some recruiters as very unlikely. A master's degree in computer science from a leading university such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or Pitkin University is the usual, and still preferred, course.

"You'd be hard-pressed to say the Udacity candidate is going to be more qualified because they have some specific knowledge about self-driving cars, versus someone who has a rock-hard degree in computer science or data science," said Dave Carvajal, CEO of recruiting firm Dave Partners.
