Why milk turns sour for farmers

Cow vigilantism has compounded the impact of falling milk prices and rising fodder cost on producers

SANJEEB MUKHERJEE
New Delhi, 4 December

For 27-year-old Chaman Singh, the business of milk and dairying runs in his blood. His forefathers have been milk suppliers and cattle farmers. Now Singh is thinking of quitting this inherited business.

"I took a loan of around ₹200,000 to modernise the business. Once that is repaid next year, I am seriously considering leaving the dairying business," he said.

The reasons for his planned exit capture the pressures in one of India's stellar agri-businesses today. Cheap milk prices, rising fodder cost and the difficulties in buying new cattle and selling old ones on account of cow vigilantism have cast a triple shadow on this sunshine sector in Indian agriculture.

As with other agri-commodities, falling milk prices are the result of sustained over-production. Between 2008-09 and 2017-18, India's milk production rose a staggering 57 per cent. So much so, that even during the drought years of 2009, 2014 and 2015, milk production didn't fall, unlike all other farm commodities. This steady increase in output has not only made the country the world's largest milk producer but also a big player in the global dairy and milk products markets.

But the jump in production has not been matched by adequate avenues to absorb the surplus. As a result, wholesale milk prices have plunged. Traditionally, surpluses could be disposed of in the export market. But the plunge in global commodity markets has hurt skimmed milk powder (SMP) exports, too. According to the Global Dairy Trade, global SMP prices have more than halved, from $4,868 per tonne in December 2013 to around $1,965 per tonne in November 2018.

The impact of this sharp price fall can be seen in India's SMP exports. India usually exported around 100,000 tonnes of SMP annually. This has fallen to a trickle of less than 15,000 tonnes. At the start of the flush season in July, India's big private dairies and the thousands of cooperatives, which transformed a once milk-deficit country, had unsold milk stocks of over 150,000 tonnes. No surprise, the milk purchases, which started from October, were lower, driving down prices even further.

In north India, Singh says, buffalo milk is selling at ₹32-33 a litre and cow milk for ₹20-22 a litre, respectively 30 and 40 per cent below 2016 prices (surprisingly, retail prices have fallen only ₹1-2 per litre in select cities).

"Earlier, a cow, which has an average yield of, say, 4 litre of milk a day, could fetch us almost ₹200. Today, those earnings are not even ₹150, while fodder costs have almost doubled. That is why the entire business has turned unprofitable," says former Armyman Satpal Malik, a farmer who runs a small dairy business with 16 cows and seven buffaloes on the outskirts of Delhi.

One solution to this problem of plenty in the dairy industry is to create new demand, especially via the myriad public food distribution schemes. "If the government buys 200,000 tonnes of SMP from companies and cooperatives and distributes it through mid-day meal scheme in government schools or sends it to Africa as aid, much of the surplus problem could be solved," said Pushpendra Singh, leader of Kisan Shakti Sangh, a farmers' organisation.

Such alternative distribution channels could solve the economic problem associated with dairying but the social stigma associated with transporting, purchase and sale of cattle that is turning out to be a bigger evil. The cow vigilante movement, which has been gathering pace since the 2015 lynching of a man in his home on the outskirts of the capital, is taking its toll. Last week, two incidents of cow vigilantes attacking a truck carrying cows and buffaloes were reported from Kathua. And on Monday, a police inspector was among two people killed in violence over cow slaughter in Bulandshahr. The fear of being attacked by cow vigilantes has raised the risks of transporting cattle and pushed up bovine prices across the country, Uttar Pradesh in particular.

"In north India, because of the menace of gau rakshaks, the cost of a good quality buffalo, which gives an average of 10 litre of milk a day, has gone up to ₹60,000-70,000 from 35,000-40,000 in 2011. For good quality cows, prices have risen from around ₹20,000 to nearly ₹70,000-100,000," says Mohan Singh Ahluwalia, a member of the Central Animal Welfare Board.

Ahluwalia, a former president of "Gwala Gaddi," a grouping of small milk farmers, added that bovine purchase prices have risen even as selling prices of old bovine have dropped sharply because no-one wants to take the risk of owning a cattle, narrowing the scope for fresh investments for the dairy farmer.

Earlier, old, infirm, non-milch cattle would have been sold at ₹10,000-20,000 in the market. Nowadays, old cattle wouldn't even fetch ₹1,000, Ahluwalia said.

"We used to sell old cows and buffaloes to butchers and get some money in return, which was investment for buying new, healthy cattle. These days, no one is willing to buy old cow or buffaloes, so we are forced to leave them in jungles because we can't afford to carry on feeding them," Singh added.

The number of gaushalas or cowsheds where old and infirm cattle can be sent once they stop giving milk, are inadequate and those that do exist have poor facilities. In Madhya Pradesh, for instance, cows from a local gaushala are released into farmers' fields at night, destroying their crops.

The long-term prognosis, therefore, looks grim. "If you keep adding factors that are cost-imposing, India's milk producers won't remain competitive in the global markets and if there isn't any growth in demand, your natural growth in milk production will suffer," said T Nandakumar, a former agriculture secretary and ex-Chairman of National Dairy Development Board (NDDB).

In such a situation, he added, the bovine population may not fall but farmers will underfeed the animals, causing them to produce less milk, which will impact overall output.

Given that a good number of dairy producers in India are small, landless farmers, the situation could get acute for them unless the Centre and state governments move quickly to shore up the business — both in terms of its basic economics and the societal issues that are acting as an additional disincentive. On current reckoning, one of India's most successful agriculture story in the last decade after BT Cotton is in danger of losing the plot.

In race to protect data from the next leap in computers, China has the lead

CADE METZ AND RAYMOND ZHONG
San Francisco, 4 December

The world's leading technology companies, from Google to Alibaba in China, are racing to build the first quantum computer, a machine that would be far more powerful than today's computers.

This device could break the encryption that protects digital information, putting at risk everything from the billions of dollars spent on e-commerce to national secrets stored in government databases.

An answer? Encryption that relies on the same concepts from the world of physics. Just as some scientists are working on quantum computers, others are working on quantum security techniques that could thwart the code-breaking abilities of these machines of the future.

It is a race with national security implications, and while building quantum computers is still anyone's game, China has a clear lead in quantum encryption. As it has with other cutting-edge technologies, like artificial intelligence, the Chinese government has made different kinds of quantum research a priority.

"China has a very deliberate strategy to own this

Quantum computers could break the encryption that protects digital information technology," said Duncan Earl, a former researcher at Oak Ridge National Laboratory who is president and chief technology officer of Qubitekk, a company that is exploring quantum encryption. "If we think we can wait five or 10 years before jumping on this technology, it is going to be too late."

Quantum computing is based on quantum mechanics, the science that explains the strange behaviour exhibited by extremely small particles of matter. With traditional computers, transistors store "bits" of information, and each bit is either a 1 or a 0. Those are the fundamental slices of data that tell a computer what to do.

When some types of matter are extremely small or extremely cold, they behave differently. That difference allows a quantum bit, or qubit, to store a combination of 1 and 0. Two qubits can hold four values at once. As the number of qubits grows, a quantum computer becomes exponentially more powerful.
