Why little girls think they can't be geniuses

Stereotypes Lead 6-Year-Olds To Believe That Men Are Smarter, More Talented

Can women be brilliant? Little girls are not so sure. A study published on Thursday in the journal 'Science' suggests that girls as young as 6 can be led to believe men are inherently smarter and more talented than women, making girls less motivated to pursue novel activities or ambitious careers.

That such stereotypes exist is hardly a surprise, but the findings show these biases can affect children at a very young age. "As a society, we associate a high level of intellectual ability with males more than females, and our research suggests that this association is picked up by children as young as 6 and 7," said Andrei Cimpian, associate professor in the psychology department at New York University. Cimpian coauthored the study, which looked at 400 children ages 5-7 years.

In the first part of the study, girls and boys were told a story about a person who is "really, really smart", a child's idea of brilliance, and then asked to identify that person among the photos of two women and two men. The people in the photos were dressed professionally, looked the same age and appeared equally happy. At 5, both boys and girls tended to associate brilliance with their own gender, meaning that most girls chose women and most boys chose men.

Till 5, both boys and girls associate brilliance with their own gender

But as they became older and began attending school, children apparently began endorsing gender stereotypes. At 6 and 7, girls were "significantly less likely" to pick women. The results were similar when the kids were shown photos of children.

Interestingly, when asked to select children who look like they do well in school, as opposed to being smart, girls tended to pick girls, which means that their perceptions of brilliance are not based on academic performance.

"These stereotypes float free of any objective markers of achievement and intelligence," Cimpian said.

In the second part of the study, children were introduced to two new board games, one described as an activity "for children who are really, really smart" and the other one "for children who try really, really hard". Five-year-old girls and boys were equally likely to want to play the game for smart kids, but at age 6 and 7, boys still wanted to play that game, while girls opted for the other activity.

"There isn't anything about the game itself that becomes less interesting for girls, but rather it's the description of it as being for kids that are really, really smart," Cimpian said. It is still unclear where the stereotypes come from. Parents, teachers and peers and the media are the usual suspects, Cimpian said. But it is evident that action must be taken so that these biases don't curtail girls' aspirations. Exposure to successful women would help, Cimpian said. AP

First human-pig embryo grown in laboratory

Nicholas Wade

For the first time, biologists have succeeded in growing human stem cells in pig embryos, shifting from science fiction to the realm of the possible the idea of developing human organs in animals for later transplant. The approach involves generating stem cells from a patient's skin, growing the desired new organ in a large animal like a pig, and then harvesting it for transplant into the patient's body. Since the organ would be made of a patient's own cells, there would be little risk of immune rejection.

The human-organ-growing pigs would be examples of chimeras, animals composed of two different genomes. They would be generated by implanting human stem cells into an early pig embryo, resulting in an animal composed of mixed pig and human cells. A team of biologists, led by Jun Wu and Juan Carlos Izpisua Belmonte at the Salk Institute, US, has shown that human stem cells can contribute to forming the tissues of a pig, despite the 90 million years of evolution between the two species. Another group, headed by Tomoyuki Yamaguchi and Hideyuki Sato of the University of Tokyo, and Hiromitsu Nakauchi of Stanford, has reversed diabetes in mice by inserting pancreas glands composed of mouse cells that were grown in a rat.

A photo provided by Salk Institute shows a 4-week-old pig embryo injected with human stem cells. The procedure raises hope of developing human organs in animals for later transplant

The Salk team's report was published in Thursday's issue of 'Cell', and the Stanford-Tokyo team's in Wednesday's issue of 'Nature'.

The two reports together establish the feasibility of trying to grow replacement human organs in animals, though such a goal is still far off. Many technical and ethical barriers have yet to be overcome, but the research is advancing alongside the acute need for organs. Creating chimeras, especially those with human cells, may prove controversial, given the possibility that test animals could be humanised in undesirable ways. Both Izpisua Belmonte and Nakauchi said there was a long way to go before human organs could successfully be grown in animals like pigs. Chimeras will be more immediately useful in studying human embryogenesis, testing drugs and following the progress of disease. NYT NEWS SERVICE

MASKED JOY: A resident wears a mask on the eve of the Lunar New Year in Manila's Chinatown

People use FB for social support, Twitter for info

Social support is the main motive for Facebook use, while Twitter usage is inspired more by the desire for new knowledge and advice, suggests a new study. Researchers at Michigan State University and San Diego State University examined the role of social networks as avenues of social support and the dynamic relationship between the two. The study was published in the journal 'Cyberpsychology, Behaviour and Social Networking'.

Two new flu vaccines for dogs developed

Scientists have for the first time developed two vaccines for canine influenza that may not only protect them but also keep you safe from the infection. Dogs infected with multiple influenza viruses have the potential to act as "mixing vessels" and generate new flu strains that could infect people, researchers said. Scientists led by Luis Martinez-Sobrido from the University of Rochester, US, have created two "live-attenuated" vaccines against the H3N8 canine influenza virus, which is currently circulating in dogs in the US.

Woman lives 6 days without lungs

May Bulman

A woman was kept alive for six days without her lungs while she waited for a transplant, in what has been called a medical world-first. Melissa Benoit was born with cystic fibrosis—a genetic disease that can cause phlegm build-up in the lungs and affect the digestive system. After she came down with flu last year, the Canadian was rushed to the intensive care unit at a hospital.

Bacteria in the 32-year-old mother-of-one's lungs became resistant to most antibiotics and as a result the disease spread throughout her body, causing her to slip into septic shock. As her blood pressure plummeted, one by one, her organs began to shut down.

The patient's terminal lung infection called for an unprecedented procedure while she waited for double transplant

Although it had never been carried out before, doctors decided to remove her lungs entirely. It was unclear whether Benoit's blood pressure and oxygen levels could be sustained during surgery and there was the possibility that she could bleed into the empty chest cavity. But at the same time they knew that removing them could potentially eliminate the source of bacterial infection. "What helped us is the fact that we knew it was a matter of hours before she would die," said Dr Shaf Keshavjee, one of the three surgeons who operated on her.

In mid-April, a team of 13 began a nine-hour surgery to remove Benoit's lungs. Hours later, her condition began to dramatically improve. A small artificial lung was connected to Benoit's heart, while other devices oxygenated and circulated her blood. Six days later a pair of donor lungs became available and she underwent a successful transplant.

"Essentially, trying this procedure could have been a death sentence," Benoit told a press conference. "Without the doctors coming up with this procedure I wouldn't be sitting here today... I still don't believe it happened. It seems very surreal." THE INDEPENDENT

France bars unlimited soda refills

Barbara Tasch

Unlimited refills of sugary drinks have officially been banned in France. Le Figaro reports, as the government aims to fight obesity and diabetes. The measure was adopted in April 2015, incorporated into the Health Act of January 2016, and came into force on Friday.

It states that drinks containing added sugars or sweeteners must not be available on an unlimited basis, either for free or for a fixed price. It means soda fountains will disappear from schools and public eateries, including hotels and restaurants. In France, one in six adults is considered obese. One in five French children is overweight.

Europe-wide, a third of children aged from six to nine years are overweight. In the UK, where over 20% of the adult population is considered obese, no such ban on unlimited refills exists but a tax on sugary drinks will be introduced in 2018. In France, a tax on sweetened beverages has been in place since 2012. The list of beverages covered by the law includes flavoured carbonated and non-carbonated soft drinks and fruit syrups. Sports drinks will also be impacted. BUSINESS INSIDER

Tastier tomato on the horizon

Los Angeles: Scientists have identified the important factors responsible for loss of flavour in tomatoes. Numerous genes responsible for the flavour have been lost as food producers selected the fruit for other qualities, such as size and firmness. Now, researchers at University of Florida, US, have unveiled the lost genes associated with the original flavour.

"We're just fixing what has been damaged over the last half a century to push them back to where they were a century ago, taste-wise," said Harry Klee of the University of Florida, adding that the technique involved classical genetics, not genetic modification. PTI

Jostle for selfies kills dolphin

A young dolphin died after beach visitors in Argentina pulled it out of the sea and took photos with it.

the shore. They could have put it back in the sea — in fact, it was breathing — but they all started taking photos and touching it." But she added: "They said it was already dead." Last year too, tourists were accused of pulling a dolphin from the sea in Argentina. Initial reports suggested the dolphin had overheated and died of dehydration while being passed around.

But the tourist who allegedly photographed the incident was interviewed by local television and said, "He was dead when he arrived on the coast. We took him back to the sea and he didn't swim back out." THE INDEPENDENT
