When timing the market hurts more than it helps

TRUTH BE TOLD
HARSH ROONGTA

Imagine a hunter-gatherer ancestor returning home with a rabbit slung over his shoulder. On the way, he spots a deer. If he carries the rabbit home, his family will eat tonight. If he chases the deer, he may return with meat for several days, or empty-handed, having lost the rabbit as well. Natural selection favoured those who balanced the two instincts: Protect what you already have, and take a chance to improve your future. Financial markets awaken the same instincts.

Markets usually call those instincts fear and greed. Fear protects what we already have. Greed, unfairly named, is the desire to improve one's future. Years of accumulated capital become today's rabbit. A rising market offers the deer. Investors naturally want both. Since markets do not allow certainty and upside together, they look for a third magical option: Market timing. Stay invested while the market rises, sell at the highs, and buy back after the market has reached the bottom. The rabbit remains safe. The deer is captured. Problem solved. Except it isn't.

Market timing demands the opposite of human behaviour. Near a market peak, nobody rings a bell. Everything looks reassuring. Near a bottom, every headline looks frightening and every decline seems to predict another. It asks investors to sell when every instinct screams stay, and buy when every instinct screams run. That is why the promise is seductive, but the execution rare.

Even if an investor could act against those instincts, that would solve only the behavioural problem. The timer must still know which high matters. Since January 2000, the market has reached an all-time high 492 times. Only seven of those highs were followed by a decline of more than 20 per cent. So let us give the timer an absurd advantage: He can identify one of those rare highs, exit exactly there, and buy back after a 20 per cent fall.

Take Covid 2020. An investor would first have had to divine that the January 2020 all-time high was one of those rare highs that would be followed by a major fall. He would then have had to sell at that high and buy back after the market crossed the 20 per cent fall mark on March 12. That was the day trading was halted after the market fell more than 10 per cent at opening. He would also have needed the nerve to sit through Manic Monday on March 23, when the market crashed again and touched its Covid low. After all that, ₹1 lakh would have grown to about ₹2.56 lakh by May 2026. The stay-invested investor would have reached about ₹2.05 lakh. The timer did better, but not transformatively better.

Real investors are not supernatural timers. In Covid 2020, they were more likely to have held on at the January high, when everything still looked reassuring, and sold around March 12, the very day the imaginary perfect timer was supposed to buy back. The March 23 crash may even have felt like vindication. But by November 9, 2020, the market had already touched a new all-time high. Fear gave way to regret, and regret to fear of missing out. The re-entry happened later, higher, and with far more emotional damage than the original fall would have caused. The real-world investor probably did much worse than the investor who simply stayed put.

Market timing therefore fails twice: For the super timer, it adds less than expected; for real investors, it can turn temporary volatility into permanent damage.

Truth be told, market timing is a mirage. Nobody can repeatedly know when the market will fall, when the danger has passed, and when it is safe to return. Good financial planning does not try to time the market, nor does it rely on finding an adviser who can. It decides in advance which money must stay safe and which money can be left alone through the uncertainty. That is how both instincts are honoured: Enough rabbit in hand to sleep at night, and enough courage left to chase the deer.

MARKET TIMING IS A MIRAGE. NOBODY CAN REPEATEDLY KNOW WHEN THE MARKET WILL FALL, WHEN THE DANGER HAS PASSED, AND WHEN IT IS SAFE TO RETURN

TACKLING REIMBURSEMENT CLAIMS IN HEALTH INSURANCE

Seek cashless approval two days ahead for planned procedures

If reimbursement becomes unavoidable, submit the complete document file at the earliest

SANJAY KUMAR SINGH & KARTHIK JEROME

A Policybazaar survey of 2,228 customers across metros and Tier-II and Tier-III cities found that cashless claims offer health insurance customers a better experience than reimbursement claims.

Cashless claims are simpler because the insurer settles the hospital bill directly. "This reduces the need to arrange a large sum during hospitalisation," says Shilpa Arora, co-founder and chief operating officer, Insurance Samadhan.

At network hospitals, negotiated package rates and a dedicated insurance or third-party administrator (TPA) desk make the process smoother. "The customer is spared the burden of documentation, as it is handled by them," says Amit Chhabra, chief business officer, Policybazaar.

When reimbursement becomes unavoidable

Reimbursement claims arise when the hospital is outside the insurer's cashless network, or when an emergency forces the patient to use the nearest hospital.

"Many policyholders assume all hospitals are empanelled and discover the gap only at admission," says Arora.

Cashless approval at discharge typically takes three to four hours. "Customers who do not want to wait may leave the hospital and file a reimbursement claim later," says Chhabra.

Why cashless approval is denied

Insurers may deny cashless claims over suspected fraud, non-disclosure, or a pre-existing condition that is still within the waiting period. Sometimes, the issue is procedural. "Authorisation may remain pending if the insurer needs additional medical records or clarification from the treating doctor," says Arora.

Reimbursement claims drawback

Cashless settlements use package rates negotiated with hospitals. "If the patient pays out of pocket, the hospital may charge its standard billing rate, which is usually higher," says Arora.

Reimbursement claims often arise at non-network hospitals. The insurer must assess whether the treatment was necessary and whether the charges are reasonable. "The insurer may seek additional medical records and scrutinise every bill line by line, which can lengthen the processing time," says Arora.

If documentation does not fully support the claim, reimbursement can lead to partial settlement or repudiation.

Documentation burden shifts to customer

The document requirement may be similar for cashless and reimbursement claims. The difference lies in who submits the papers. "In reimbursement claims, the customer has to organise and submit the documents and fill out the forms," says Chhabra.

Delays hurt finances

If documentation is in order, reimbursement claims usually get settled in seven to ten days, though the standard timeline is 30 days. The window can extend if the insurer asks for missing papers or raises a medical or policy-related query. "The policyholder may have to go back and forth between the hospital and the insurer to gather additional information, caus-

Get the paperwork right

- Preserve the initial diagnosis, discharge summary, prescriptions and diagnostic reports
- Collect the original itemised hospital bill with seal, signature and GST number
- Preserve receipts for every payment made
- Submit a fully completed claim form signed by the patient and the hospital
- Provide bank account details, photo identity proof and policy copy ing delay," says Arora. Claims may also take longer if the customer delays responding to queries or if an inspection is carried out. Every extra day leaves the policyholder carrying the hospitalisation cost, especially if the money has been arranged through a credit card or personal loan.

How to avoid this route

Customers should seek cashless approval well in time. "For planned hospitalisation, they should apply at least a day or two before treatment," says Kapil Mehta, co-founder, SecureNow Insurance Broker.

Some insurers may have a tighter window. "Customers should confirm the exact intimation window for their policy," says Saurabh Vijayvergia, founder and chief executive officer, CoverSure. Inform the insurer as soon as hospitalisation is confirmed.

Vijayvergia says customers should respond quickly to pre-authorisation queries. "They should also check the hospital's cashless status immediately before admission as the insurer's network can change," he says.

Before discharge, ensure the hospital sends all papers on time. "If the insurer is under time pressure, it is more likely to ask the customer to file a reimbursement claim," says Mehta.

Steps to improve outcome

Review the hospital bill daily during treatment. "Billing errors are easier to correct while treatment is going on and harder to correct after the final bill is generated," says Vijayvergia.

Anticipate questions on the need for hospitalisation or whether the ailment was pre-existing. "If such questions are likely, submit a note explaining your position clearly," says Mehta.

Submit the complete document set together, not in batches. "The document-submission window is 15 to 30 days from discharge. File within the prescribed window to avoid friction," says Vijayvergia.

If a claim stalls, escalate first to the insurer's grievance officer, then the Bima Bharosa grievance portal, and finally the insurance ombudsman.

Mistakes to avoid

Do not avoid cashless for convenience, even for small claims. "Skipping cashless to save a few hours at discharge can create a bigger problem later," says Arora.

Do not delay filing reimbursement claims. "Delays can make documents harder to obtain and prompt the insurer to question why the claim was filed late," says Mehta.

Preserve original bills and documents during hospitalisation, keep scanned copies before sending them to the insurer, and use the claim number to track the claim.

Do not ignore small mismatches. "A misspelt name or a mismatch in dates between the claim form and hospital records can cause avoidable delay," says Vijayvergia.
