Pakistan is bombing Afghans for its own failures

It's a horrifying story. Pakistan's Air Force bombed villages along the border, killing more than 28 people and injuring twice that number, according to the United Nations mission in Afghanistan. The strikes, as is usual Pakistani practice, were launched near midnight on Sunday, when women, children and, presumably, alleged terrorists were asleep in their beds. Areas hit by these strikes and ground operations included Paktia, Paktika and Kunar, for decades the stamping grounds for the hundreds of Pakistan-trained fighters who fought first the Soviets, then the Najibullah government and now, ironically, its own supposed protégés, the Taliban. It's been a long haul. And it looks like all of this could get rapidly worse. The air strikes, using American F-16s and Chinese JF-17s, were in retaliation for an attack against the paramilitary Pakistan Rangers headquarters in Karachi, using an explosive-laden vehicle, and another blast at a nearby facility. Jamaat-ul-Ahrar (JuA) claimed the attack, while army officials blamed India, without pausing for breath, just hours later. An Afghan has been arrested, and 'confessions' from him blaming Delhi can be expected soon, without an iota of credible evidence. Meanwhile, although the army has admitted to four casualties, the total could be far higher, given that witnesses said the blast felt like an earthquake. The JuA has certainly been responsible for some of the worst attacks in Pakistan, including one on a children's park in Lahore in 2015 that killed at least 72 people and injured hundreds more. The JuA was said to be closely aligned with Al Qaeda, with strong sympathies for the Uighur cause, among others. Its leader, Omar Khalid Khorasani, was mysteriously assassinated while travelling for talks with the Pakistanis, arranged by Kabul. His death hit the group hard, and it now has diffused leadership, with small groups operating independently. The UN sanctions committee page tellingly notes that "Most of JuA commanders and operatives hail from Mohmand Agency... (who) dispersed after Pakistan's military operation Zarb-e-Azb." In other words, they are all Pakistanis. That reality is why the Taliban have long begged the Pakistanis to put their own house in order before blaming - and targeting - their neighbours. Consider that the Karachi attack would not have been possible without some local support in the city, where the explosive-laden truck was probably assembled. Remember also that when Pakistan started its operations in February 2025, thousands of local residents were driven out of the Tirah Valley in the freezing cold, leading to huge protests. These and other areas along the border have been virtually destroyed by years of such operations. Hardly surprising, then, that there is likely to be little or no human intelligence from these areas. That's no counter-terrorism. That's cutting your own throat. Meanwhile, Dropsite News exposes the harrowing experience Afghan women and children are going through. Drones, called 'bangana' in Pashto - meaning 'buzzing bees' - fly through the night, causing severe psychological torment. Imagery shows tiny graves where children were killed and entire families wiped out. Yet Pakistan talks of 'precise', 'intelligence-based' operations. Meanwhile, Kabul faces another serious threat: the presence of Islamic State Khorasan Province (IS-KP) along the Balochistan and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa borders. Kabul managed to virtually wipe out the group inside the country, but since then it seems to have dug in within Balochistan and the tribal areas, which Kabul attacked in April using its few Soviet-era helicopters and a handful of transport aircraft.

When Canadian rights become weapons for Khalistani activists

A campaign now circulating gives the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) an ultimatum: publicly prove its account of Air India Flight 182 or withdraw it. On June 23, 2026, CSIS stated plainly that 'a bomb planted by Canada-based Khalistani extremists' destroyed Kanishka, killing all 329 people aboard. Its 2024 public report had attributed the bombing to Canada-based extremists; its 2025 report identified the suspects as members of Canada-based Khalistani extremist groups. Some Khalistani organisations and activists now demand that CSIS reproduce the evidence behind a four-decade-old terrorism investigation and effectively retry the case in public. They are entitled to challenge the government. But the tactic is revealing where acquittal becomes exoneration, missing evidence becomes proof of another theory, litigation becomes punishment and freedom of expression becomes intimidation at a memorial.

Canadian rights are invoked, then stretched beyond what the law established. This history does not just rest on one intelligence assessment. Canada conducted an extensive investigation and one of its most complex criminal trials. Bob Rae completed an independent federal review, followed by Justice John Major's multi-year public inquiry. Canadian surveillance officers followed Talwinder Singh Parmar and Inderjit Singh Reyat into woods near Duncan, British Columbia, where they heard what investigators later believed was a bomb test. Japanese investigators recovered physical evidence from the Narita explosion, traced bomb components and purchases to Reyat and helped secure his conviction. CSIS did not discover these facts in 2026. Yet it took 41 years to state its conclusion so directly. That delay caused damage. Official hesitation left a vacuum in which Parmar could be recast from the identified mastermind behind the bombing into a victim, criminal outcomes could be distorted into political vindication, and a documented Canadian terrorist plot could be reduced to merely one 'version' of history. By the time CSIS spoke without ambiguity, denial had been repeated, organised and politically normalised. That revisionism now follows victims into memorial spaces. Families gather to mourn 329 people, including 82 children. Khalistani activists have appeared at commemorations disputing responsibility for the bombing. Parmar, identified by the judge and the Air India inquiry as the plot's mastermind, continues to appear on Canadian posters labelled 'Shaheed and martyred'. The history of the Khalistani movement cannot be cleansed of bombings, assassinations, suicide attacks and intimidation by presenting the advocacy as peaceful. Freedom of expression protects lawful political speech. It should not require governments, police and public authorities to treat targeted provocation at a victims' memorial as ordinary debate. Why are authorities more confident protecting such displays than protecting grieving families from intimidation? A memorial should not force victims to defend the history of their own loss.

Tara Singh Hayer remains the clearest example of this institutional imbalance. Hayer was a Sikh journalist who opposed Khalistani violence and became a critical potential witness in the Air India case. An explosive device was found outside his newspaper office. In 1988, Harkirat Singh Bagga shot him repeatedly, leaving him permanently disabled. Bagga was prosecuted through Canada's youth-justice system. Prosecutions has questioned his stated age, identity documents and how he qualified for those protections. Every accused person is entitled to due process. But Canada protected the accused through law while failing to protect the witness whose evidence the law required. Hayer continued speaking despite his injuries and threats. In 1998, he was murdered before he could testify. His murder eliminated one of the prosecution's most important potential witnesses. Evidence died with him, the case lost a critical voice, and every remaining witness understood the message: speaking could cost them their life. Other witnesses faced the same fear. One anonymous witness told CSIS that Bagri sought her car before the bombing and said only the baggage, not he, would be travelling. The court found no apparent motive for her to invent the allegation and accepted that fear explained her silence. But because the defence could not cross-examine her, the account could not carry the necessary evidentiary weight. In law, that may have been defensible. In practice, the defence's right to question her outweighed the reality that she feared she could be killed for answering. Another protected witness delayed revealing an alleged confession by Ripudaman Singh Malik, while she was being threatened. She entered witness protection and said the experience had destroyed her life. Yet the delay caused by fear was later used to brand her account unreliable. This was the pattern: intimidation damaged the witness, and the damage was then used against the case. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is essential. The manipulation comes later, when a precise legal outcome is inflated into a political declaration. An acquittal means the Crown failed to prove a specific charge; it does not clear an entire movement.
