BuzzFeed to reduce 15% of jobs

BUZZFEED IS ELIMINATING 15% of its headcount across the company, the latest pullback for digital-media sites dealing with a challenging advertising market.

As it trims staff, BuzzFeed has been examining the "the evolving economics of digital platforms," CEO Jonah Peretti said in a memo to employees. The cutbacks are part of a wave of media layoffs. Verizon Communications said earlier Wednesday that it would be cutting about 7% of its digital-media operations, a business that includes AOL, Yahoo! and the Huffington Post. Gannett also has been laying off journalists from its collection of newspapers.

Indian millennials are turning to algorithms for love

BLOOMBERG

January 24

PAWAN GUPTA WASN'T having any luck finding a match.

The 31-year-old MBA graduate wanted to get married and scoured dating apps and Indian matrimonial websites. Yet after four years of looking and dating, he was no closer to walking around the sacred fire typical of the Hindu marriage ceremony.

So, the MIT Sloan School of Management alum decided to build an AI-powered matchmaking app, one that would determine emotional, intellectual and social compatibility. Gupta teamed up with engineer Rahul Namdev to create Betterhalf, employing a wide swath of data to figure out who could be successfully matched for marriage.

The service is starting to have success. Manoj Kumar Singh, 32, turned to Betterhalf after years of failures with traditional matchmaking and dating websites. He was paired up with an HS-BC executive he found kind and caring; they were married within months. "Over four years, I thought I'd tried everything," Singh recounted telling friends when he first heard of Betterhalf. "After so many frustrating attempts, an AI-based app helped find me a wife."

AI systems are flourishing in dating apps the world over, using deep-learning to analyse Facebook posts or users' tweets to gauge how compatible they would be for each other. Nowhere is this more significant than in India, where marriage remains a goal for many in the world's largest youthful population of more than 400 million millennials. Local entrepreneurs, global dating apps and Indian matrimonial websites are racing to bring artificial intelligence to modernise match-making.

There is, however, a lingering question. "Is India culturally ready for AI matchmaking apps?" said DD Mishra, a research director and analyst based in India for Gartner.

Gupta's experiences with Indian matrimonial websites and global websites suggest young urban Indians are ready for something new. He'd become increasingly distressed by the process. One match made over a site went awry when she told him she was interested only in a spouse who could get an overseas posting. On another first date, he arrived wearing a new shirt to meet a woman matched by a matrimonial website who left him stranded. And it took him months to realise that someone he was chatting with on a dating app wasn't interested yet kept him dangling. "I felt rejected again and again," Gupta said. "There's a woman out there for me, but none of the dating apps or matrimonial websites was helping me find her." So he turned to algorithms and started Betterhalf.

The firm, funded by 15 angel investors including half a dozen MIT alumni, puts users through several levels of verification comprising social networks, phone number, personal and work email and government ID. New registrants answer a breadth of questions including on moral values, emotions and personality traits. That information is then melded with data from married individuals, open-source data and compatibility research. After matching people, post-interaction user polls help weed out the creepers.

There are thousands of dating apps around the world, Gupta said during a conversation at the Betterhalf's headquarters, a home converted into quirky office space. "There's a ready market of tens of millions of educated urban Indians seriously looking for partners so why is nobody getting it right?"

Betterhalf is targeted solely to serious spouse seekers. The start-up has 15 employees — 13 are single, use the app and half-mockingly refer to their office as a marriage lab. They are in the app's core demographic, ages 25 to 40.
