FRANCOISE MEYERS BECOMES 12TH RICHEST PERSON L'Oreal heir is first woman with $100-billion fortune

TARA PATEL December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oreal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998.

Despite the gain, Bettencourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion.

When people under lockdown used less makeup. That was followed by a rapid rebound as consumers splurged on luxury items, sending the shares up 35% this year.

The reclusive Bettencourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oreal, a globe-spanning €24.1 billion ($268 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%.

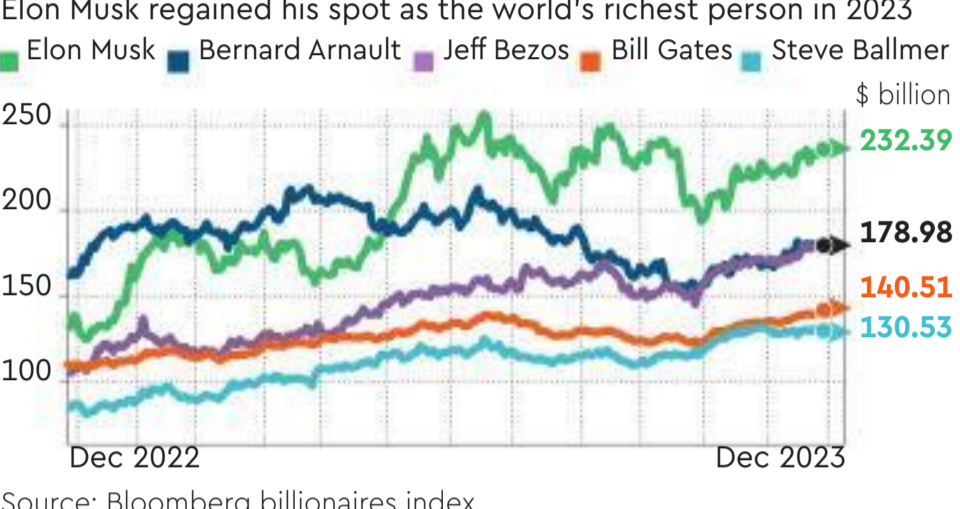

Bettencourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-volume study of the Bible and a genealogy of the Greek gods—and is known for playing piano for hours every day.

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest.

The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $65.8 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $95.4 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX, after losing $138 billion in 2022.

Amazon.com Inc. founder Jeff Bezos added more than $70 billion to his wallet this year while Mark Zuckerberg's fortune jumped by over $80 billion.

SA: The flop story continues

SANDIP G New Delhi, December 29

SOUTH AFRICA INTIMIDATES batsmen. The bounce frightens them; worse when invariably bounce kicks in. The pace harries them; if the surface does not offer, the pacemen would. The sideways movement torments them, when it does not swing, it would inevitably seam.

History offers lessons. Only one overseas batsman has managed five hundreds ever in the country. That is Sachin Tendulkar. The next on the list is Wally Hammond, with four.

Batches of batsmen from the subcontinent with brimming self-belief have returned home with crushed morale.

Doziness cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy.

home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not.

missal—bowed when driving a full ball—posed serious questions on his technique, chiefly his judgment of lengths and his weight transfer. Skilled though he is, his travails overseas are piling on. Wobbles in England, struggles in West Indies, labours against the moving, the future of Indian batting does not seem as bright as it once shone.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle. But at this stage of his career, he is some distance away from their scaling lofty levels.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failing of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20 age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is valid.

FRANCOISE MEYERS BECOMES 12TH RICHEST PERSON L'Oreal heir is first woman with $100-billion fortune

TARA PATEL December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oreal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998.

Despite the gain, Bettencourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion.

The reclusive Bettencourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oreal, a globe-spanning €241 billion ($268 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%.

Bettencourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-

Stock rebound

As an only child, Bettencourt Meyers came into her wealth following the 2017 death of her mother, Liliane Bettencourt, with whom she had an at times contentious relationship.

A legal battle in the aughts grew from a family feud to a political scandal that centered on whether the elderly mother was fit to manage the family's wealth.

when people under lockdown used less makeup.

That was followed by rapid rebound as consumers splurged on luxury items, sending the shares up 35% this year. The company's stock could rise another 1.2% over the next year as its product and geographic diversity shows resilience.

Bettencourt Meyers also chairs her family's holding company, Téthys, which has the L'Oreal stake. Her husband, Jean-Pierre Meyers, is chief executive. In 2016, the two set up subsidiary Téthys Invest SAS, which bets on areas that don't compete with the company.

Musk leads world's richest

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest.

The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $65 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $9.5 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX.

Amazon.com Inc. founder Jeff Bezos added more than $70 billion to his wallet this year while Mark Zuckerberg's fortune jumped by over $80 billion.

Dozens cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy. He has seen balls climb, he would have noticed how competent batsmen leave.

home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not.

Instincts undid Gill, the mantle-bearer of India's batting school in the post-Kohli era. A ball darting into the hips would light up the eyes of most Asian batsmen.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle.

Both innings, it was not his supposed enemy, the short ball, that nailed him. But the full balls. Perhaps, it's the subconscious fear of the short-ball on midriff that has tied his feet on the crease.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failing of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20-age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is valid.

FRANCOISE MEYERS BECOMES 12TH RICHEST PERSON

L'Oreal hair is first woman with $100-billion fortune

TARA PATEL
December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oréal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998. She's the 12th-richest person in the world, just behind Mexico's Carlos Slim.

Despite the gain, Bettecourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion. France's growing domination of luxury retail has spawned several other ultra-rich families, including the clan behind Hermes International SCA, who have amassed Europe's largest family fortune, and the Wertheimer brothers who own Chanel.

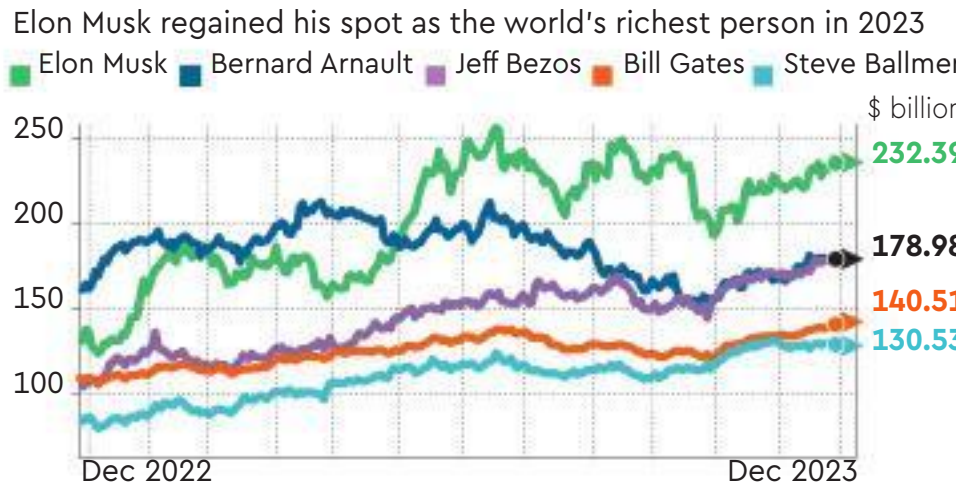

The reclusive Bettecourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oréal, a globe-spanning €241 billion ($268 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%. Her sons, Jean-Victor Meyers and Nicolas Meyers, are also directors. Run by executives from outside the family for decades, the firm was founded in 1909 by Bettecourt Meyers' chemist grandfather, Eugene Schueller, to produce and sell a hair dye he had developed.

Bettecourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-volume

Stock rebound

As an only child, Bettecourt Meyers came into her wealth following the 2017 death of her mother, Liliane Bettecourt, with whom she had an at times contentious relationship.

A legal battle in the aughts grew from a family feud to a political scandal that centered on whether the elderly mother was fit to manage the family's wealth. Last month, Netflix Inc. came out with a three-part documentary, L'Affaire Bettecourt, relating the saga that featured a former French president and secret recordings made by a butler. L'Oréal grew rapidly in the decade leading up to the pandemic but took a hit during the health crisis when people under lockdown used less makeup.

That was followed by a rapid rebound as consumers splurged on luxury items, sending the shares up 35% this year. The company's stock could rise another 12% over the next year as its product and geographic diversity shows resilience, according to Consumer Edge Research analyst Brett Cooper.

Bettecourt Meyers also chairs her family's holding company, Téthys, which has the L'Oréal stake. Her husband, Jean-Pierre Meyers, is chief executive. In 2016, the two set up subsidiary Téthys Invest SAS, which bets on areas that don't compete with the company. With the stated intention of making "direct long-term investments in entrepreneurial projects," the CEO of Téthys Invest is Alexandre Benais, an ex-Lazard investment banker. —BLOOMBERG

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest.

The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. Once again, their fortunes were closely correlated to the performance of tech stocks, which rose to fresh records this year despite recession fears, lingering inflation, lofty interest rates and geopolitical turmoil.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $658 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence. No one did better than Elon Musk, who recaptured the title of world's richest person from French luxury tycoon Bernard Arnault.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $9.54 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX, after losing $1.38 billion in 2022. His net worth is now more than $50 billion above Arnault's after a global slowdown in demand for luxury goods dented shares of LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE. Amazon.com Inc. founder Jeff Bezos added more than $70 billion to his wallet this year while Mark Zuckerberg's fortune jumped by over $80 billion. —BLOOMBERG

SOUTH AFRICA INTIMIDATES batsmen. The bounce frightens them; worse when invariably bounce kicks in. The pace harries them; if the surface does not offer, the pacemen would. The sideways movement torments them, when it does not swing, it would inevitably seam. Nullifying even one of the devils is arduous enough, a combination of all three would make batting an ordeal of fire for even high-grade batters. In case none of the elements conspire, the country's ever-stocked stable of thoroughbred pacemen would wreak havoc and misery.

History offers lessons. Only one overseas batsman has managed five hundreds ever in the country. That is Sachin Tendulkar. The next on the list is Wally Hammond, with four. Several of the greats from the subcontinent have left these shores, crushed and stung. Rahul Dravid, that great condition-transcending technician, averages 29.71; the Pakistani virtuoso Inzamam-ul-Haq fared slightly better, at 31.78.

Batches of batsmen from the subcontinent with brimming self-belief have returned home with crushed morale. The latest band of India's youngsters too realised the bitter truth in three humiliating days in Centurion. Between them, the torchbearers of Indian batting in the years to come—Yashasvi Jaiswal, Shubman Gill and Shreyas Iyer—managed only 87 runs between them, and survived just 157 balls. That is 36 overs and a ball, that is four overs short of a full session of Test match cricket, that is just three more runs than South Africa's number 7, Marco Jansen, strung up without getting out. At first sight, you could empathize with their inexperience. The subsequent viewing would tell a different story. It was slackness and not inadequate playing time that fashioned both of Jaiswal's dismissals. In the first innings, the 22-year-old threw away a composed start with a loose drive, seized perhaps by the delusion that he is settled enough to be not devoured by a fundamental folly. The ball was pitched up, and was wide of the stumps. In the subcontinent, he could have driven with eyes blindfolded. But this was South Africa, and the most venomous 22-yard species. The ball swung a fraction to elude the sweet-spot of his bat. The front-foot was nowhere near the pitch of the ball, his hands were hard and heavy and the balance was off-kilter. This was not merely inexperience, but glowing slackness. Even without the lateral movement, such a reckless stroke would have captured his wicket on most surfaces.

Doziness cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy. He has seen balls climb, he would have noticed how competent batsmen leave. They lift their hands like calling out someone from a distance, at a full upward stretch, or slide the bat away from the line of the ball, like the home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not. The ball climbed and brushed the underside of his right-hand glove. A soft dismissal so to speak, but one that told hard truths.

Instincts undid Gill, the mantle-bearer of India's batting school in the post-Kohli era. A ball darting into the hips would light up the eyes of most Asian batsmen. They could work it off their hips, glide it past fine-leg, or depending on the height, flick or pull. But on bouncy tracks, it could lead to a strangle, and such temptations are intertemporances. He could not resist feeling the ball and ended up gloving to the wicket-keeper on the leg-side. Yet another soft dismissal, but one down to the batsman's utter naivety, unbecoming of someone who has featured in 19 Tests. His second-innings dismissal—bowed when driving a full ball—posed serious questions on his technique, chiefly his judgment of lengths and his weight transfer. Skilled though he is, his travails overseas are piling on. Wobbles in England, struggles in West Indies, labours against the moving, the future of Indian batting does not seem as bright as it once shone.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle. But at this stage of his career, he is some distance away from scaling lofty levels. By 35 innings, Kohli already had hundreds in Australia and South Africa; Tendulkar in England, Australia and South Africa. His short-form numbers are incredible, but has yet to crack the Test code, despite the gifts he possesses. Iyer too has the virtues to be a middle-order virtuoso. He can straddle the roles of an enforcer, counterpuncher, and accumulator. Yet, he cannot cut the frills, resist the impulse to play every ball to the fence, or evolve into a nonsense batsman he is capable of being. Too often, he tried too hard for the boundaries. Such an approach could be profitable in Asia but not in South Africa or England. Both innings, it was not his supposed enemy, the short ball, that nailed him. But the full balls. Perhaps, it's the subconscious fear of the short-ball on midriff that has tied his feet on the crease, swamped his mind, manifesting in a feeble front-foot press. Quality bowlers would scavenge on such fallibilities of mind and technique, stymying his progress in this format.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failing of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20-age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is valid. Their temperament was akin to the orthodox ODI batting formula—exercise discretion at the start and then expand the canvas. In South Africa, a batsman seldom acquires pure mastery over conditions, or situations. Jaiswal, Gill, and Iyer would surely have learned their lessons from Centurion. Lest, South Africa would continue to intimidate, and even swallow the careers.

FRANCOISE MEYERS BECOMES 12TH RICHEST PERSON L'Oreal hair is first woman with $100-billion fortune

TARA PATEL December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oréal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998.

Despite the gain, Bettencourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion.

The reclusive Bettencourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oréal, a globe-spanning €241 billion ($268 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%.

Bettencourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-volume study of the Bible and a genealogy of the Greek gods—and is known for playing piano for hours every day.

Stock rebound

As an only child, Bettencourt Meyers came into her wealth following the 2017 death of her mother, Liliane Bettencourt, with whom she had an at times contentious relationship.

A legal battle in the aughts grew from a family feud to a political scandal that centered on whether the elderly mother was fit to manage the family's wealth. Last month, Netflix Inc. came out with a three-part documentary, L'Affaire Bettencourt, relating the saga that featured a former French president and secret recordings made by a butler.

Musk leads world's richest

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest. The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index.

Once again, their fortunes were closely correlated to the performance of tech stocks, which rose to fresh records this year despite recession fears, lingering inflation, lofty interest rates and geopolitical turmoil.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $65.8 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence. No one did better than Elon Musk, who recaptured the title of world's richest person from French luxury tycoon Bernard Arnault.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $9.5 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX, after losing $1.3 billion in 2022. His net worth is now more than $50 billion above Arnault's after a global slowdown in demand for luxury goods dented shares of LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE.

SA: The flop story continues

SANDIP G New Delhi, December 29

SOUTH AFRICA INTIMIDATES batsmen. The bounce frightens them; worse when invariably bounce kicks in. The pace harries them; if the surface does not offer, the pacemen would. The sideways movement torments them, when it does not swing, it would inevitably seam. Nullifying even one of the devils is arduous enough, a combination of all three would make batting an ordeal of fire for even high-grade batters.

History offers lessons. Only one overseas batsman has managed five hundreds ever in the country. That is Sachin Tendulkar. The next on the list is Wally Hammond, with four. Several of the greats from the sub-continent have left these shores, crushed and stung. Rahul Dravid, that great condition-transcending technician, averages 29.71; the Pakistani virtuoso Inzamam-ul-Haq fared slightly better, at 31.78.

Batches of batsmen from the subcontinent with brimming self-belief have returned home with crushed morale. The latest band of India's youngsters too realised the bitter truth in three humiliating days in Centurion.

Between them, the torchbearers of Indian batting in the years to come—Yashasvi Jaiswal, Shubman Gill and Shreyas Iyer—managed only 87 runs between them, and survived just 157 balls. That is 36 overs and a ball, that is four overs short of a full session of Test match cricket, that is just three more runs than South Africa's number 7, Marco Jansen, strung up without getting out. At first sight, you could empathize with their inexperience. The subsequent viewing would tell a different story. It was slackness and not inadequate playing time that fashioned both of Jaiswal's dismissals.

In the first innings, the 22-year-old threeway-a-composed start with a loose drive, seized perhaps by the delusion that he is settled enough to be not devoured by a fundamental folly. The ball was pitched up, and was wide of the stumps. In the subcontinent, he could have driven with eyes blindfolded. But this was South Africa, and the most venomous 22-yard species. The ball swung a fraction to elude the sweet-spot of his bat. The front-foot was nowhere near the pitch of the ball, his hands were hard and heavy and the balance was off-kilter. This was not merely inexperience, but glowing slackness. Even without the lateral movement, such a reckless stroke would have captured his wicket on most surfaces.

Doziness cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy. He has seen balls climb, he would have noticed how competent batsmen leave. They lift their hands like calling out someone from a distance, at a full upward stretch, or slide the bat away from the line of the ball, like the home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not. The ball climbed and brushed the underside of his right-hand glove. A soft dismissal so to speak, but one that told hard truths.

Instincts untried Gill, the mantle-bearer of India's batting school in the post-Kohli era. A ball darting into the hips would light up the eyes of most Asian batsmen. They could work it off their hips, glide it past fine-leg, or depending on the height, flick or pull. But on bouncy tracks, it could lead to a strangle, and such temptations are intemperances. He could not resist feeling the ball and ended up gloving to the wicket-keeper on the leg-side. Yet another soft dismissal, but one down to the batsman's utter naivety, unbecoming of someone who has featured in 19 Tests. His second-innings dismissal—bowed when driving a full ball—posed serious questions on his technique, chiefly his judgment of lengths and his weight transfer. Skilled though he is, his travails overseas are piling on. Wobbles in England, struggles in West Indies, labours against the moving, the future of Indian batting does not seem as bright as it once shone.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle. But at this stage of his career, he is some distance away from scaling lofty levels. By 35 innings, Kohli already had hundreds in Australia and South Africa; Tendulkar in England, Australia and South Africa. His short-form numbers are incredible, but has yet to crack the Test code, despite the gifts he possesses. Iyer too has the virtues to be a middle-order virtuoso. He can straddle the roles of an enforcer, counterpuncher, and accumulator. Yet, he cannot cut the frills, resist the impulse to play every ball to the fence, or evolve into a no nonsense batsman he is capable of being. Too often, he tried too hard for the boundaries. Such an approach could be profitable in Asia but not in South Africa or England. Both innings, it was not his supposed enemy, the short ball, that nailed him. But the full balls. Perhaps, it's the subconscious fear of the short-ball on midriff that has tied his feet on the crease, swamped his mind, manifesting in a feeble front-foot press. Quality bowlers would scavenge on such fallibilities of mind and technique, stymying his progress in this format.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failure of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20-age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is invalid. Their temperament was akin to the orthodox ODI batting formula—exercise discretion at the start and then expand the canvas. In South Africa, a batsman seldom acquires pure mastery over conditions, or situations. Jaiswal, Gill, and Iyer would surely have learned their lessons from Centurion. Lest, South Africa would continue to intimidate, and even swallow the careers.

TARA PATEL December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oréal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998. She's the 12th-richest person in the world, just behind Mexico's Carlos Slim.

Despite the gain, Bettencourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion. France's growing domination of luxury retail has spawned several other ultra-rich families, including the clan behind Hermes International SCA, who have amassed Europe's largest family fortune, and the Wertheimer brothers who own Chanel.

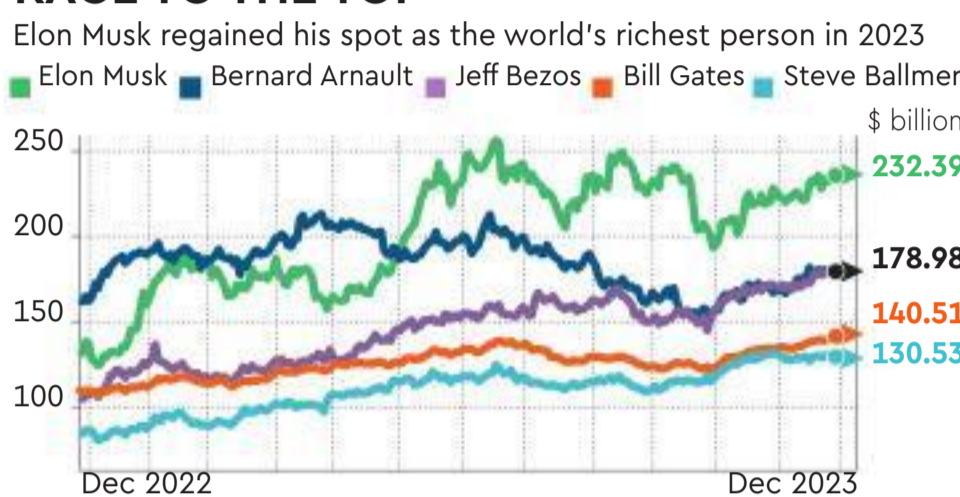

The reclusive Bettencourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oréal, a globe-spanning €24.1 billion ($26.8 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%. Her sons, Jean-Victor Meyers and Nicolas Meyers, are also directors. Run by executives from outside the family for decades, the firm was founded in 1909 by Bettencourt Meyers' chemist grandfather, Eugene Schueller, to produce and sell a hair dye he had developed.

Bettencourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-volume study of the Bible and a genealogy of the Greek gods—and is known for playing piano for hours every day.

Stock rebound

As an only child, Bettencourt Meyers came into her wealth following the 2017 death of her mother, Liliane Bettencourt, with whom she had an at times contentious relationship.

A legal battle in the aughts grew from a family feud to a political scandal that centered on whether the elderly mother was fit to manage the family's wealth. Last month, Netflix Inc. came out with a three-part documentary, L'Affaire Bettencourt, relating the saga that featured a former French president and secret recordings made by a butler. L'Oréal grew rapidly in the decade leading up to the pandemic but took a hit during the health crisis when people under lockdown used less makeup.

That was followed by a rapid rebound as consumers splurged on luxury items, sending the shares up 35% this year. The company's stock could rise another 12% over the next year as its product and geographic diversity shows resilience, according to Consumer Edge Research analyst Brett Cooper.

Bettencourt Meyers also chairs her family's holding company, Téthys, which has the L'Oréal stake. Her husband, Jean-Pierre Meyers, is chief executive. In 2016, the two set up subsidiary Téthys Invest SAS, which bets on areas that don't compete with the company. With the stated intention of making "direct long-term investments in entrepreneurial projects," the CEO of Téthys Invest is Alexandre Benais, an ex-Lazard investment banker. —BLOOMBERG

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest.

The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. Once again, their fortunes were closely correlated to the performance of tech stocks, which rose to fresh records this year despite recession fears, lingering inflation, lofty interest rates and geopolitical turmoil.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $65.8 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence. No one did better than Elon Musk, who recaptured the title of world's richest person from French luxury tycoon Bernard Arnault.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $95.4 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX, after losing $13.8 billion in 2022. His net worth is now more than $50 billion above Arnault's after a global slowdown in demand for luxury goods dented shares of LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE. Amazon.com Inc. founder Jeff Bezos added more than $70 billion to his wallet this year while Mark Zuckerberg's fortune jumped by over $80 billion. —BLOOMBERG

SA: The flop story continues

SANDIP G New Delhi, December 29

SOUTH AFRICA INTIMIDATES batsmen. The bounce frightens them; worse when invariably bounce kicks in. The pace harries them; if the surface does not offer, the pacemen would. The sideways movement torments them, when it does not swing, it would inevitably seam. Nullifying even one of the devils is arduous enough, a combination of all three would make batting an ordeal of fire for even high-grade batters. In case none of the elements conspire, the country's ever-stocked stable of thoroughbred pacemen would wreak havoc and misery.

History offers lessons. Only one overseas batsman has managed five hundreds ever in the country. That is Sachin Tendulkar. The next on the list is Wally Hammond, with four. Several of the greats from the subcontinent have left these shores, crushed and stung. Rahul Dravid, that great condition-transcending technician, averages 29.71; the Pakistani virtuoso Inzamam-ul-Haq fared slightly better, at 31.78.

Batches of batsmen from the subcontinent with brimming self-belief have returned home with crushed morale. The latest band of India's youngsters too realised the bitter truth in three humiliating days in Centurion. Between them, the torchbearers of Indian batting in the years to come—Yashasvi Jaiswal, Shubman Gill and Shreyas Iyer—managed only 87 runs between them, and survived just 157 balls. That is 36 overs and a ball, that is four overs short of a full session of Test match cricket, that is just three more runs than South Africa's number 7, Marco Jansen, strung up without getting out. At first sight, you could empathize with their inexperience. The subsequent viewing would tell a different story. It was slackness and not inadequate playing time that fashioned both of Jaiswal's dismissals. In the first innings, the 22-year-old throwaway composed start with a loose drive, seized perhaps by the delusion that he is settled enough to be not devoured by a fundamental folly. The ball was pitched up, and was wide of the stumps. In the subcontinent, he could have driven with eyes blindfolded. But this was South Africa, and the most venomous 22-yard species. The ball swung a fraction to elude the sweet-spot of his bat. The front-foot was nowhere near the pitch of the ball, his hands were hard and heavy and the balance was off-kilter. This was not merely inexperience, but glowing slackness. Even without the lateral movement, such a reckless stroke would have captured his wicket on most surfaces.

Doziness cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy. He has seen balls climb, he would have noticed how competent batsmen leave. They lift their hands like calling out someone from a distance, at a full upward stretch, or slide the bat away from the line of the ball, like the home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not. The ball climbed and brushed the underside of his right-hand glove. A soft dismissal so to speak, but one that told hard truths.

Instincts undid Gill, the mantle-bearer of India's batting school in the post-Kohli era. A ball darting into the hips would light up the eyes of most Asian batsmen. They could work it off their hips, glide it past fine-leg, or depending on the height, flick or pull. But on bounce tracks, it could lead to a strangle, and such temptations are intertemporal. He could not resist feeling the ball and ended up gloving to the wicket-keeper on the leg-side. Yet another soft dismissal, but one down to the batsman's utter naivety, unbecoming of someone who has featured in 19 Tests. His second-innings dismissal—bowed when driving a full ball—posed serious questions on his technique, chiefly his judgment of lengths and his weight transfer. Skilled though he is, his travails overseas are piling on. Wobbles in England, struggles in West Indies, labours against the moving, the future of Indian batting does not seem as bright as it once shone.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle. But at this stage of his career, he is some distance away from scaling lofty levels. By 35 innings, Kohli already had hundreds in Australia and South Africa; Tendulkar in England, Australia and South Africa. His short-form numbers are incredible, but has yet to crack the Test code, despite the gifts he possesses. Iyer too has the virtues to be a middle-order virtuoso. He can straddle the roles of an enforcer, counterpuncher, and accumulator. Yet, he cannot cut the frills, resist the impulse to play every ball to the fence, or evolve into a no nonsense batsman he is capable of being. Too often, he tried too hard for the boundaries. Such an approach could be profitable in Asia but not in South Africa or England. Both innings, it was not his supposed enemy, the short ball, that nailed him. But the full balls. Perhaps, it's the subconscious fear of the short-ball on midriff that has tied his feet on the crease, swamped his mind, manifesting in a feeble front-foot press. Quality bowlers would scavenge on such fallibilities of mind and technique, stymying his progress in this format.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failure of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20-age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is valid. Their temperament was akin to the orthodox ODI batting formula — exercise discretion at the start and then expand the canvas. In South Africa, a batsman seldom acquires pure mastery over conditions, or situations. Jaiswal, Gill, and Iyer would surely have learned their lessons from Centurion. Lest, South Africa would continue to intimidate, and even swallow the careers.

L'Oréal heir is first woman with $100-billion fortune

TARA PATEL
December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oréal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998. She's the 12th-richest person in the world, just behind Mexico's Carlos Slim.

Despite the gain, Bettencourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion. France's growing domination of luxury retail has spawned several other ultra-rich families, including the clan behind Hermes International SCA, who have amassed Europe's largest family fortune, and the Wertheimer brothers who own Chanel.

The reclusive Bettencourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oréal, a globe-spanning €241 billion ($268 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%. Her sons, Jean-Victor Meyers and Nicolas Meyers, are also directors. Run by executives from outside the family for decades, the firm was founded in 1909 by Bettencourt Meyers' chemist grandfather, Eugene Schueller, to produce and sell a hair dye he had developed.

Bettencourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-volume study of the Bible and a genealogy of the Greek gods—and is known for playing piano for hours every day.

Stock rebound

As an only child, Bettencourt Meyers came into her wealth following the 2017 death of her mother, Liliane Bettencourt, with whom she had an at times contentious relationship.

A legal battle in the aughts grew from a family feud to a political scandal that centered on whether the elderly mother was fit to manage the family's wealth. Last month, Netflix Inc. came out with a three-part documentary, L'Affaire Bettencourt, relating the saga that featured a former French president and secret recordings made by a butler. L'Oréal grew rapidly in the decade leading up to the pandemic but took a hit during the health crisis when people under lockdown used less makeup.

That was followed by a rapid rebound as consumers splurged on luxury items, sending the shares up 35% this year. The company's stock could rise another 12% over the next year as its product and geographic diversity shows resilience, according to Consumer Edge Research analyst Brett Cooper.

Bettencourt Meyers also chairs her family's holding company, Téthys, which has the L'Oréal stake. Her husband, Jean-Pierre Meyers, is chief executive. In 2016, the two set up subsidiary Téthys Invest SAS, which bets on areas that don't compete with the company. With the stated intention of making "direct long-term investments in entrepreneurial projects," the CEO of Téthys Invest is Alexandre Benais, an ex-Lazard investment banker. —BLOOMBERG

Musk leads world's richest

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest.

The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. Once again, their fortunes were closely correlated to the performance of tech stocks, which rose to fresh records this year despite recession fears, lingering inflation, lofty interest rates and geopolitical turmoil.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $658 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence. No one did better than Elon Musk, who recaptured the title of world's richest person from French luxury tycoon Bernard Arnault.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $95.4 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX, after losing $138 billion in 2022. His net worth is now more than $50 billion above Arnault's after a global slowdown in demand for luxury goods dented shares of LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE. Amazon.com Inc. founder Jeff Bezos added more than $70 billion to his wallet this year while Mark Zuckerberg's fortune jumped by over $80 billion. —BLOOMBERG

SA: The flop story continues

SANDIP G
New Delhi, December 29

SOUTH AFRICA INTIMIDATES batsmen. The bounce frightens them; worse when invariably bounce kicks in. The pace harries them; if the surface does not offer, the pacemen would. The sideways movement torments them, when it does not swing, it would inevitably seam. Nullifying even one of the devils is arduous enough, a combination of all three would make batting an ordeal of fire for even high-grade batters. In case none of the elements conspire, the country's ever-stocked stable of thoroughbred pacemen would wreak havoc and misery.

History offers lessons. Only one overseas batsman has managed five hundreds ever in the country. That is Sachin Tendulkar. The next on the list is Wally Hammond, with four. Several of the greats from the subcontinent have left these shores, crushed and stung. Rahul Dravid, that great condition-transcending technician, averages 29.71; the Pakistani virtuoso Inzamam-ul-Haq fared slightly better, at 31.78.

Batches of batsmen from the subcontinent with brimming self-belief have returned home with crushed morale. The latest band of India's youngsters too realised the bitter truth in three humiliating days in Centurion. Between them, the torchbearers of Indian batting in the years to come—Yashasvi Jaiswal, Shubman Gill and Shreyas Iyer—managed only 87 runs between them. and survived just 157 balls. That is 36 overs and a ball, that is four over short of a full session of Test match cricket, that is just three more runs than South Africa's number 7, Marco Jansen, strung up without getting out. At first sight, you could empathize with their inexperience. The subsequent viewing would tell a different story. It was slackness and not inadequate playing time that fashioned both of Jaiswal's dismissals. In the first innings, the 22-year-old threw away a composed start with a loose drive, seized perhaps by the delusion that he is settled enough to be not devoured by a fundamental folly. The ball was pitched up, and was wide of the stumps. In the subcontinent, he could have driven with eyes blindfolded. But this was South Africa, and the most venomous 22-yard species. The ball swung a fraction to elude the sweet-spot of his bat. The front-foot was nowhere near the pitch of the ball, his hands were hard and heavy and the balance was off-kilter. This was not merely inexperience, but glowing slackness. Even without the lateral movement, such a reckless stroke would have captured his wicket on most surfaces.

Doziness cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy. He has seen balls climb, he would have noticed how competent batsmen leave. They lift their hands like calling out someone from a distance, at a full upward stretch, or slide the bat away from the line of the ball, like the home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not. The ball climbed and brushed the underside of his right-hand glove. A soft dismissal so to speak, but one that told hard truths.

Instincts undid Gill, the mantle-bearer of India's batting school in the post-Kohli era. A ball darting into the hips would light up the eyes of most Asian batsmen. They could work it off their hips, glide it past fine-leg, or depending on the height, flick or pull. But on bouncy tracks, it could lead to a strangle, and such temptations are intemperate. He could not resist feeling the ball and ended up gloving to the wicket-keeper on the leg-side. Yet another soft dismissal, but one down to the batsman's utter naivety, unbecoming of someone who has featured in 19 Tests. His second-innings dismissal—bowed when driving a full ball—posed serious questions on his technique, chiefly his judgment of lengths and his weight transfer. Skilled though he is, his travails overseas are piling on. Wobbles in England, struggles in West Indies, labours against the moving, the future of Indian batting does not seem as bright as it once shone.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle. But at this stage of his career, he is some distance away from scaling lofty levels. By 35 innings, Kohli already had hundreds in Australia and South Africa; Tendulkar in England, Australia and South Africa. His short-form numbers are incredible, but has yet to crack the Test code, despite the gifts he possesses. Iyer too has the virtues to be a middle-order virtuoso. He can straddle the roles of an enforcer, counterpuncher, and accumulator. Yet, he cannot cut the frills, resist the impulse to play every ball to the fence, or evolve into a no nonsense batsman he is capable of being. Too often, he tried too hard for the boundaries. Such an approach could be profitable in Asia but not in South Africa or England. Both innings, it was not his supposed enemy, the short ball, that nailed him. But the full balls. Perhaps, it's the subconscious fear of the short-ball on midriff that has tied his feet on the crease, swamped his mind, manifesting in a feeble front-foot press. Quality bowlers would scavenge on such fallibilities of mind and technique, styming his progress in this format.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failing of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20-age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is valid. Their temperament was akin to the orthodox ODI batting formula—exercise discretion at the start and then expand the canvas. In South Africa, a batsman seldom acquires pure mastery over conditions, or situations. Jaiswal, Gill, and Iyer would surely have learned their lessons from Centurion. Lest, South Africa would continue to intimidate, and even swallow the careers.

FRANCOISE MEYERS BECOMES 12TH RICHEST PERSON L'Oreal hair is first woman with $100-billion fortune

TARA PATEL December 28

FRANCOISE BETTENCOURT MEYERS became the first woman to amass a $100 billion fortune, marking another milestone for the heiress and for France's expanding fashion and cosmetics industries.

Her wealth jumped to $100.1 billion on Thursday, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. The milestone came as shares of L'Oréal SA, the beauty products empire founded by her grandfather, rose to a record high, with the stock set for its best year since 1998.

Despite the gain, Bettencourt Meyers' fortune is still significantly less than that of French compatriot Bernard Arnault, founder of luxury goods purveyor LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE, who is second in the global ranking with $179 billion.

The reclusive Bettencourt Meyers, 70, is vice-chair of the board of L'Oréal, a globe-spanning €241 billion ($268 billion) company in which she and her family are the single biggest shareholders with a stake of nearly 35%.

Bettencourt Meyers keeps her life private, shunning the glitzy social life sought by many of the world's wealthy. She has written two books—a five-volume study of the Bible and a genealogy of the Greek gods—and is known for playing piano for hours every day.

RACE TO THE TOP

Elon Musk regained his spot as the world's richest person in 2023, followed by Bernard Arnault, Jeff Bezos, Bill Gates, and Steve Ballmer.

Stock rebound As an only child, Bettencourt Meyers came into her wealth following the 2017 death of her mother, Liliane Bettencourt, with whom she had an at times contentious relationship.

A legal battle in the aughts grew from a family feud to a political scandal that centered on whether the elderly mother was fit to manage the family's wealth. Last month, Netflix Inc. came out with a three-part documentary, L'Affaire Bettencourt, relating the saga that featured a former French president and secret recordings made by a butler.

L'Oréal grew rapidly in the decade leading up to the pandemic but took a hit during the health crisis

when people under lockdown used less makeup.

That was followed by a rapid rebound as consumers splurged on luxury items, sending the shares up 35% this year. The company's stock could rise another 12% over the next year as its product and geographic diversity shows resilience, according to Consumer Edge Research analyst Brett Cooper.

Bettencourt Meyers also chairs her family's holding company, Téthys, which has the L'Oréal stake. Her husband, Jean-Pierre Meyers, is chief executive. In 2016, the two set up subsidiary Téthys Invest SAS, which bets on areas that don't compete with the company. With the stated intention of making "direct long-term investments in entrepreneurial projects," the CEO of Téthys Invest is Alexandre Benais, an ex-Lazard investment banker. —BLOOMBERG

IT WAS A comeback year for the world's wealthiest.

The combined net worth of the 500 richest people surged by $1.5 trillion in 2023, fully rebounding from the $1.4 trillion lost the year prior, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. Once again, their fortunes were closely correlated to the performance of tech stocks, which rose to fresh records this year despite recession fears, lingering inflation, lofty interest rates and geopolitical turmoil.

Tech billionaires saw their wealth grow by 48% or $65.8 billion, propelled by intense hype around artificial intelligence. No one did better than Elon Musk, who recaptured the title of world's richest person from French luxury tycoon Bernard Arnault.

The Tesla Inc. chief executive officer netted an additional $9.5 billion through Thursday's close, bolstered by the success of Tesla and SpaceX, after losing $1.3 billion in 2022. His net worth is now more than $50 billion above Arnault's after a global slowdown in demand for luxury goods dented shares of LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SE. Amazon.com Inc. founder Jeff Bezos added more than $70 billion to his wallet this year while Mark Zuckerberg's fortune jumped by over $80 billion. —BLOOMBERG

SA: The flop story continues

SANDIP G New Delhi, December 29

SOUTH AFRICA INTIMIDATES batsmen. The bounce frightens them; worse when invariably bounce kicks in. The pace harries them; if the surface does not offer, the pacemen would. The sideways movement torments them, when it does not swing, it would inevitably seam. Nullifying even one of the devils is arduous enough, a combination of all three would make batting an ordeal of fire for even high-grade batters.

History offers lessons. Only one overseas batsman has managed five hundreds ever in the country. That is Sachin Tendulkar. The next on the list is Wally Hammond, with four. Several of the greats from the subcontinent have left these shores, crushed and stung. Rahul Dravid, that great condition-transcending technician, averages 29.71; the Pakistani virtuoso Inzamam-ul-Haq fared slightly better, at 31.78.

Batches of batsmen from the subcontinent with brimming self-belief have returned home with crushed morale. The latest band of India's youngsters too realised the bitter truth in three humiliating days in Centurion. Between them, the torchbearers of Indian batting in the years to come—Yashasvi Jaiswal, Shubman Gill and Shreyas Iyer—managed only 87 runs between them, and survived just 157 balls. That is 36 overs and a ball, that is four overs short of a full session of Test match cricket, that is just three more runs than South Africa's number 7, Marco Jansen, strung up without getting out. At first sight, you could empathize with their inexperience. The subsequent viewing would tell a different story. It was slackness and not inadequate playing time that fashioned both of Jaiswal's dismissals. In the first innings, the 22-year-old threeway a composed start with a loose drive, seized perhaps by the delusion that he is settled enough to be not devoured by a fundamental folly. The ball was pitched up, and was wide of the stumps. In the subcontinent, he could have driven with eyes blindfolded. But this was South Africa, and the most venomous 22-yard species. The ball swung a fraction to elude the sweet-spot of his bat. The front-foot was nowhere near the pitch of the ball, his hands were hard and heavy and the balance was off-kilter. This was not merely inexperience, but glowing slackness. Even without the lateral movement, such a reckless stroke would have captured his wicket on most surfaces.

Doziness cost him in the second innings. He left the ball on length, the decision to shoulder arms was sensible. Execution, though, was lazy. He has seen balls climb, he would have noticed how competent batsmen leave. They lift their hands like calling out someone from a distance, at a full upward stretch, or slide the bat away from the line of the ball, like the home-grown batsmen do, or sway their body away. Jaiswal's leave was feeble and confused—South Africa is the last destination for half measures, whether playing a ball or not. The ball climbed and brushed the underside of his right-hand glove. A soft dismissal so to speak, but one that told hard truths.

Instincts untried Gill, the mantle-bearer of India's batting school in the post-Kohli era. A ball darting into the hips would light up the eyes of most Asian batsmen. They could work it off their hips, glide it past fine-leg, or depending on the height, flick or pull. But on bouncy tracks, it could lead to a strangle, and such temptations are intemperate. He could not resist feeling the ball and ended up gloving to the wicket-keeper on the leg-side. Yet another soft dismissal, but one down to the batsman's utter naivety, unbecoming of someone who has featured in 19 Tests. His second-innings dismissal—bowed when driving a full ball—posed serious questions on his technique, chiefly his judgment of lengths and his weight transfer. Skilled though he is, his travails overseas are piling on. Wobbles in England, struggles in West Indies, labours against the moving, the future of Indian batting does not seem as bright as it once shone.

Certainly, he is just 24, and there is time yet to fix the cracks. He could still inherit the Sunil Gavaskar-Tendulkar-Kohli mantle. But at this stage of his career, he is some distance away from their scaling lofty levels. By 35 innings, Kohli already had hundreds in Australia and South Africa; Tendulkar in England, Australia and South Africa. His short-form numbers are incredible, but has yet to crack the Test code, despite the gifts he possesses. Iyer too has the virtues to be a middle-order virtuoso. He can straddle the roles of an enforcer, counterpuncher, and accumulator. Yet, he cannot cut the frills, resist the impulse to play every ball to the fence, or evolve into a no nonsense batsman he is capable of being. Too often, he tried too hard for the boundaries. Such an approach could be profitable in Asia but not in South Africa or England. Both innings, it was not his supposed enemy, the short ball, that nailed him. But the full balls. Perhaps, it's the subconscious fear of the short-ball on midriff that has tied his feet on the crease, swamped his mind, manifesting in a feeble front-foot press. Quality bowlers would scavenge on such fallibilities of mind and technique, stymying his progress in this format.

It's often a knee-jerk reaction to accuse white-ball cricket for the failing of batsmen, especially those bred in the T20-age, in Tests. In the case of the trio, such an argument is invalid. Their temperament was akin to the orthodox ODI batting formula—exercise discretion at the start and then expand the canvas. In South Africa, a batsman seldom acquires pure mastery over conditions, or situations. Jaiswal, Gill, and Iyer would surely have learned their lessons from Centurion. Lest, South Africa would continue to intimidate, and even swallow the careers.
