Did You Know?

The cameras used to record the first footprints ever made on the Moon were almost as complex as the science that took them there. The camera used by Neil Armstrong to click the pictures of the Moon consisted of a miniature bearing made by SKF. That bearing weighed just 6.7 grams and was modified so it could efficiently function in the harsh lunar atmosphere.

The miniature SKF bearing in the camera played a significant role in taking photographs that have since become iconic.
