From crisis to advantage:
 How India can outplay
 the Trump tariff gambit

A simple summary of the recent brouhaha about President Trump's imposition of 25 per cent tariffs on India as well as his comment on India's 'dead economy' is the following from Shakespeare's Macbeth: 'full of sound and fury, signifying nothing'. Trump further imposed punitive tariffs totalling 50 per cent on August 6 allegedly for India funding Russia's war machine by buying oil.

As any negotiator knows, a good opening gambit is intended to set the stage for further parleys, so that you could arrive at a negotiated settlement that is acceptable to both parties. The opening gambit could well be a maximalist statement, or one's 'dream outcome', the opposite of which is 'the walkway point' beyond which you are simply not willing to make concessions. The usual outcome is somewhere in between these two positions or postures.

Trump is both a tough negotiator, and prone to making broad statements from which he has no problem retracting later. His down-and-dirty boardroom tactics that he's bringing to international trade. Therefore, I think Indians don't need to get rattled. It's not the end of the world, and there will be climbdowns and adjustments. Think hard about the long term.

I was on a panel discussion on this topic on TV just hours after Trump made his initial 25 per cent announcement, and I mentioned an interplay between geo-politics and geo-economics. Trump is annoyed that his Ukraine-Russia play is not making much headway, and also that BRICS is making progress towards de-dollarisation. India is caught in this crossfire ('collateral damage') but the geo-economic facts on the ground are not favourable to Trump.

I am in general agreement with Trump on his objectives of bringing manufacturing and investment back to the US, but I am not sure that he will succeed, and anyway his strong-arm tactics may backfire. I consider below what India should be
