Passport as instrument of peaceful protest

TRUTH BE TOLD
HARISH ROONTRA

It was 1989. My spouse and I were in Madurai, stepping out of our hotel to visit the Meenakshi temple, when we were surrounded by cycle-rickshaw drivers vying for our attention. One yells out through the din — “Aao, aao Bhai” (Come, come, sit — in Gujarati). The phrase was so unexpected — we understand Gujarati but aren’t Gujarati ourselves — that we promptly close his rickshaw.

In a region known for its political resistance to learning other languages, Gujarati, Sundar — our semi-literate, Tamil-speaking driver — had picked up a smattering of Gujarati, along with bits of several other languages. Through gestures and an improvised multilingual conversation, we learned that he had taught himself these phrases to better serve tourists — and had been rewarded for it. That encounter stayed with me as a lasting lesson: Economic incentives can shape human behaviour in ways that politics often cannot. Similar patterns emerge across tourist hotspots: Signboards in German, Russian and Hebrew in Rishikesh, for instance, reflect the rising number of visitors there from countries where these languages are spoken. Sundar’s story comes to mind amid the growing grassroots movement in India. Citizens choosing not to travel to Turkey and Azerbaijan. This voluntary restraint stems from the unambiguous support these countries offer Pakistan, especially on issues like Kashmir and cross-border terrorism, as well as their deepening military ties.

Today, India’s admired soft power — from Yoga to cinema to cuisine — has begun extending to our travel decisions. The presence of a Bollywood-themed restaurant at the summit of Jungfrau in Switzerland, the availability of Hindi-speaking local guides in Afdon and packages for the Serengeti and Masai Mara, and the presence of dedicated wedding planners, caterers, and priests for Indian weddings in unlikely countries abroad — all speak volumes about the economic influence and cultural footprint of Indian travellers. It is in this context that we need to see the travel statistics for Turkey and Azerbaijan. In 2024, over 330,000 Indians visited Turkey, contributing an estimated $85–100 million in tourism revenue. India also ranked as the third-largest source of tourists for Azerbaijan. Indian travellers — particularly in the luxury and event-tourism sectors — tend to spend significantly above average, giving them quite an economic clout. The travel boycott isn’t about Jagdism. It’s akin to choosing organic over pesticide-laden produce or opting for fair-trade goods. Travel isn’t just about leisure; it’s a transaction of trust, culture, and capital. Choosing where not to go becomes a peaceful yet powerful way to express values.

Gandhian wisdom
During the freedom struggle, Gandhi advocated the boycott of British goods — not through aggression, but through dignified economic disengagement. It wasn’t just about health; it was a deeper statement about identity, autonomy, and dignity. Just like what Indians purchased, or did not, defined what they stood for during the Swadeshi movement, where we go or don’t reflects what we stand for. Truth be told, economics is a quiet yet potent force. It impelled Sundar to learn new languages. Likewise, withholding discretionary economic benefits, like tourism revenue, can impel nations to pause and reflect. Even if it doesn’t lead to immediate change, it unmistakably conveys the sentiments of Indian citizens.

Soft power works gradually and is susceptible to fizzling out — unless bolstered by political leadership. The current boycott of Turkey and Azerbaijan must be acknowledged and reinforced by political and social leaders if it is to endure beyond a passing impulse. Sometimes, the most powerful messages are delivered not through confrontation, but through dignified silence and deliberate inaction. Just as Gandhi’s spinning wheel became a symbol of resistance, Indian travellers today can turn their passports into instruments of peaceful protest. If doing so makes you feel virtuous, that’s just a bonus. In the end, it reinforces a timeless truth — Economics Trumps Politics (and very much intended).

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR HYPERTENSIVES

Buy policy with zero waiting period, cumulative bonus riders

Try bringing condition under control to improve chances of getting coverage

SAHJAY KUMAR BISHI & KARTHIK BHOWME

May 17 was celebrated as World Hypertension Day. Around 25 per cent of Indian adults suffer from hypertension, according to the World Health Organization and the India Hypertension Control Initiative. This condition can lead to serious complications such as heart disease, stroke, kidney and eye disorders, and cognitive decline. “Hypertension can be the root cause of many diseases regarded as chronic or critical,” says Aashish Yadav, head — products and business operations, Manulife Global Health Insurance.

the level of hypertension is moderate or low, then the customer could be offered a comprehensive policy without any loading,” says Yadav. If the condition is more severe, coverage may still be available, with loading. Some disease-specific products are available for such people though they offer limited coverage. “Nowadays, the majority of people suffering from hypertension can buy a regular health insurance policy. They also do not have to face any exclusion or extended waiting period. Only in around 5 per cent of cases, where the markers for hypertension are beyond acceptable limits, the policy may be issued with a loading or copayment,” says Siddhant Singhal, head — health insurance, Policybazaar. Earlier, with pre-existing conditions like hypertension faced long waiting periods. Some products may still carry a waiting period of 2-3 years. “But nowadays many insurers offer products with zero waiting period,” says Yadav. Singhal informs that by paying an additional premium of 18–20 per cent, customers can reduce the waiting period from two-three years to zero (policy comes into force after the initial 30-day waiting period). Insurers have also introduced cumulative bonus riders. “The sum insured can go up by 100 per cent at the time of renewal. And there is no limit on how much the sum insured can increase. This feature can be highly beneficial for customers suffering from hypertension, who have a higher chance of a heart attack, stroke, etc — conditions that are expensive to treat,” says Singhal. Condition management programs have been launched to help control hypertension. Insurers provide regular checkups, teleconsultations and in-person sessions with doctors.

Selecting the right policy
Customers should prioritise a zero waiting period. Also, check for sub-limits on the treatment of hypertension and conditions arising from it. As far as possible, avoid policies with sub-limits. Singhal recommends opting for the cumulative bonus and OPD benefit riders. Mosamkar advises checking whether the insurer’s cashless hospital network includes hospitals that the customer is likely to visit in a medical situation. He also recommends selecting a plan that offers wellness benefits, including preventive health check-ups. Avoid policies with copayment or caps on room rent. “Modern treatments may be required to treat the illnesses caused by hypertension. Look for policies that do not have a cap for modern treatments,” says Singhal.

Improving chances of coverage
Undertake regular blood pressure monitoring and adhere to prescribed medication. “Make better lifestyle choices, such as reducing salt intake, engaging in regular physical activity, maintaining an optimal weight, quitting smoking, and managing stress to improve your chances of getting a policy,” says Mosamkar. Medical records that demonstrate your condition is under control can support your application. Premiums can be reduced if hypertension is well managed. Opting for a deductible, lower-grade room, using the insurer’s hospital network, and choosing monthly payments can also help manage premium costs.

Mistakes to avoid
Buyers should avoid mistakes like not disclosing hypertension, failing to understand policy terms and opting for insufficient cover. Given high medical inflation, buy an adequate sum insured and supplement the policy with a cumulative bonus rider.
