South steals the spotlight

Hits from Hindi film industry in post-Covid era have been fewer and far between

VIVEAT SUSAN PINTO Mumbai, December 27

THREE YEARS AGO, a line from the Allu Arjun-starrer Pushpa: The Rise went viral, forcing cine goers to take note. Pushpa flower nahin, fire hain were among dialogues that scorched the box office, sparking off a trend: The rise of south films.

In the three years since the first instalment of Pushpa (in December 2021), the craze for south movies has grown significantly. In 15 days of its release on December 5, Pushpa 2 crossed the ₹1,000-crore mark in box office collections in India, with around 60% coming from the Hindi version and the rest from south Indian languages including its language of origin Telugu.

Though action entertainers and horror comedies from Bollywood such as Khan's Jawan and Pathaan, Kartik Aaryan's Bhoor Bhulaiyaa 2 and 3, Ranbir Kapoor's Animal and Shradha Kapoor's Stree 2 have lit the box office in the last two to three years, hits from the Hindi film industry in the post-pandemic era have been fewer and far between.

ema across the country. At the same time, exhibitors also point to the gradual alienation of small-town India in mainstream Hindi entertainment.

town India clamouring for their dose of masala entertainment, replete with action, drama and comedy. Akkshay Rathie, a film exhibitor and distributor, who is also a director at Nagpur-based cinema chain Aashirwad Theatres, says that Hindi film-makers have become less risk-takers now versus earlier.

Does India want BGT win or Rohit back in form?

SRIRAM VEERA Melbourne, December 27

THE GREAT GAMBLE didn't come off. The opening didn't need any fixing; Rohit Sharma's batting did. But the most bewildering event was not that Rohit opened but the way he went about it. The shot he got out wasn't one of intent nor was he 'smashing' the ball. Rohit was slow in the movements and hesitant in the mind.

India's captain Rohit Sharma walks off after losing his wicket on the second day of the fourth cricket test between Australia and India at the Melbourne Cricket Ground on Friday

If the reason for his elevation was to bat with more freedom, as an attacking mindset can get the feet, hands, eyes sharper, the Indian captain should have tried that approach first in the middle order when the ball turns softer and isn't seaming around. Caution isn't working lower down, so let's try with some whiteball adventurism at the top - Test cricket doesn't work like that.

In case openers KL Rahul or Yashasvi Jaiswal had been struggling, Rohit's elevation would have made sense. But with his form, and more importantly the form and touch of the openers, the change of batting order wasn't really warranted.

need the team to be successful and retain the BGT. For a captain who had heroically put the team above himself thus far, and also in the past set the white-ball template and dragged the limited-overs team to modern times by himself by his aggressive batting, this move is pretty odd. And the reasons are unconvincing.

It's not an act of a selfish man, but that of a man desperate to show his utility. Maybe, he wanted to set the tone like he has done in the past, but with three innings potentially left for him, it's now or bust. Now that he has pitched himself as opener - one expects him to continue doing it rather than bailing out - he has to be proactive, alert, alive to the moment. With this pitch likely to ease up even more and Sydney is never a fast-bowling paradise, he has better chances of pulling it off. For that, though, the mind and body have to be in sync. On this relatively demon-free pitch, it shouldn't have surprised him that Pat Cummins would try surprising him with a shortish ball - and that it won't be on the legside but the one that lands outside off and shapes away. Rohit's instinct to pull might have been age-old, but so is the body and the form now. Since it's Rohit, people might be wary of making a pronouncement against him. India have to win one of the two Tests to retain the Border-Gavaskar Trophy and they may feel like throwing a counter-punch first, instead of waiting and watching. Fair brave sentiment, but that blow can come in other ways. Not creating a potential problem where none exists - at the opening.
