2Ws present big challenge for Delhi EV policy: Crisil

THE TWO-WHEELER category presents a bigger challenge for the recently announced Delhi EV policy, which will ban the registration of conventional-engine bikes and scooters from April 2028, with electric penetration in the segment at just 7.3% in Delhi in FY26, according to Crisil Ratings.

While the April 2028 EV-only registration requirement provides a clear roadmap for the two-wheeler industry to accelerate investments in electric products, capacity and distribution, internal combustion engine (ICE) models are expected to remain relevant in the near term, Crisil Ratings Director Poonam Upadhyay told PTI.

The future growth in Delhi's two-wheeler market will increasingly be linked to EV readiness, she said, responding to a query about the policy's implications for ICE manufacturers, especially in the two-wheeler category.

"The impact on ICE manufacturers will vary across segments. In two-wheelers, the transition is expected to be gradual, with EVs accounting for only 7.3% of Delhi's registration in FY26," Upadhyay noted.

AI will break growth, says TCS CEO

The chairman has spoken about having as many AI agents as employees within three years. How do you plan to achieve that?

We already have around 2,500 AI agents delivering customer solutions. Employees have also built many more for their own productivity, perhaps 10 times that number. Going forward, there will no longer be a linear relationship between the volume of work we deliver and the number of people we employ. AI agents will augment employees, enabling us to do diversificatively more work with the same workforce.

AI models come with high token costs. How are these costs reflected in deal pricing?

The productivity gains we deliver today already account for token costs. Customers ultimately look at faster delivery, better quality, lower total cost of ownership and a positive return on investment. There is a perception that every workload requires the latest frontier model, which is expensive. In reality, workloads can run on open-source models, on-premise deployments or earlier-generation frontier models.

Selecting the right model for the right workload is where a system integrator creates value, supported by FinOps capabilities that optimise costs. Commercial structures vary in some engagements, token costs are bundled into the pricing, while in others, customers pay for tokens separately.

What is the latest update on TCS' planned data centre investments?

The project is progressing well and we are evaluating multiple locations. We are in advanced discussions and expect to announce a definitive Letter of Intent during the second quarter. The infrastructure will be spread across multiple states rather than a single location, and the announcement will be made along with customers that have committed to capacity.

How much of TCS' business is now outcome-based?

It depends on the type of engagement. Many Global Business Services deals are already outcome-based. In IT services, the commercial model may not explicitly be outcome-based, but we often commit to delivering specific productivity improvements, such as a 1% gain, and execute against those commitments. So, even if the billing model is different, a significant share of our engagements today is built around delivering committed business outcomes.
