● ANIMESH DAS, MD & CEO, ACKO GENERAL INSURANCE

'Irdai reforms to bring drastic changes in distribution'

ACKO General Insurance Managing Director and Chief Executive Animesh Das believes that Irdai's distribution reforms will force a complete overhaul in the insurance industry's existing distribution model. He explains to Narayanan V how the direct-to-consumer (D2C) insurer is placed to meet the reforms and how motor insurance consumers could benefit from lower premiums and wider choice. Excerpts:

How will Irdai's distribution reforms impact the industry as well as ACKO?

The challenge for the industry is that penetration is almost stagnant. There is no effort or initiative to simplify the customer experience and claims settlement, or to make the product affordable. Intermediaries benefit the most from the way commissions are structured. Unfortunately, that's the only lever the industry has to grow or get business. Against this backdrop, Irdai moves shift the focus to the consumer. I am hopeful that insurers will also take that direction and invest in customer experience to grow their businesses, instead of figuring out ways to bypass regulation and do some financial jugglery. As regards ACKO, we have no intermediaries. Our focus has always been to develop tech-driven processes so that expenses remain low and we are able to provide better, affordable pricing to the consumer.

Motor premiums grew by 34% while commissions grew by 259% between FY23 and FY25. What's wrong with motor insurance distribution?

The motor dealer who actually sells a new car attaches insurance to it. It is almost like a closed-door captive customer. The insurance commission is as high as 50-60% over there. If you are buying a ₹10 lakh car, the insurance premium will come out to be almost ₹78,000, and the dealer commission alone will be ₹40,000-50,000. Since motor insurance is mandatory, the car dealer's effort is negligible. He is are just taking a printout and handing it over to the car buyer. How is that effort worth ₹40,000-50,000? On top of it, dealers often make customers buy insurance from them because of the hefty incentive. Most of the companies in motor insurance are overly dependent on this practice. According to proposed reforms, dealers will have negligible incentive for any of these things. Companies which are dependent on these kinds of OEM or dealer partnerships will face a challenge, making them to revisit the whole structure. This will be a big DNA change.

Digital intermediaries or web aggregators are among the worst hit by this proposal. Your views?

If a company is selling something digitally through its own website or any partner website, the operational cost is supposed to be lower as it is not deploying people on the ground or operating branches. Logically, it should be passed on to the insurance company in the form of better economics or further passed on to the consumer in the form of better pricing or claims experience. Unfortunately, this is not happening at present. Prices remain same and customers go through the same ordeal as everything still depends on the insurance company. So, it is just an online version of a physical process. It is not truly an efficient model.

If the effort of selling an insurance product is as high as 30-40%, it means the product itself is wrong. The effort should not be more than 10-15%. That should be the focus area, instead of creating a dull product and pushing it on to the consumer by throwing money into the distribution arm. I think that's what Irdai has reset.

> OUR FOCUS HAS ALWAYS BEEN TO DEVELOP TECH-DRIVEN PROCESSES SO THAT EXPENSES REMAIN LOW AND WE ARE ABLE TO PROVIDE BETTER PRICING

AI upskilling moves up the stack: From freshers to leaders

ALTHOUGH FRESHERS ACCOUNT for 43% of registrations, working professionals constitute the larger share of learners.

At upGrad, sign-ups for technology courses between January and August 2026 were around 2.55 times those in the same period last year, with more than 90% of learners opting for an AI-focused programme. Freshers now account for about 20% of enrolments, down from around 30% earlier, while the number of learners with more than 10 years of experience has nearly doubled, Anuj Vishwakarma, CEO, higher education, upGrad, told FE.

The shift is also visible in advanced programmes. upGrad's executive AI programme in partnership with IIT Kharagpur has grown threefold quarter-on-quarter, with the median learner having around 12 years of work experience. Enrolments in its C-suite AI programme have risen nearly sixfold year-on-year, although the company said the smaller base makes the growth more indicative of intent than volume.

The nature of demand is changing alongside the profile of learners. Until 2025, interest was concentrated around machine learning, data science, GenAI and prompt engineering. This year, learners are increasingly looking at large language model application development, AI strategy and transformation, cybersecurity, data strategy, and AI-powered cloud and DevOps, Kumar said.

The progression has broadly moved from prompting and understanding GenAI to applying AI within specific functions and, now, building autonomous systems. Agentic AI and GenAI remain major draws, but the focus has shifted towards building AI agents, multi-agent systems and end-to-end applications that can operate in production. Data professionals are also moving from analysis towards building AI agents.

Experienced professionals are ahead of freshers in hands-on adoption, with 30% having already built an AI agent or automation compared with 21% of freshers. This indicates that AI upskilling is increasingly becoming an extension of existing professional expertise rather than a standalone technology skill.

The demand is also creating new roles. Scaler's AI Forward Deployed Engineer programme, launched about six weeks ago, has already crossed 100 enrolments. The programme was earlier part of its modern software engineering course but has now been expanded into a dedicated 12-month programme, reflecting rising demand for professionals who can translate AI capabilities into working solutions for businesses.
