Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group on Thursday it has secured land to build a A$200 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long-delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

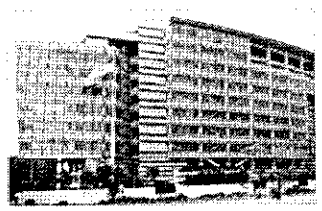
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to roll out early into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 230,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the U.S. carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire. "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue." Seshagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.8 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBIT) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.89 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus estimate downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group said on Thursday it has secured land to build a A$200 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long-delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

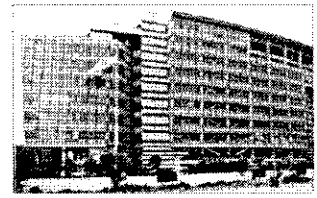
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 20,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the U.S. carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire . "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue." Seshagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 20,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the US carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire . "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue," Sesbagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.6 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBIT) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.88 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus estimate downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group said on Thursday it has secured land to build a A$200 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long-delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that have long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.9 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBITDA) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.89 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus estimate downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

IndiGo boards Travelport for fare, product distribution

New Delhi, Nov 24: Domestic airline IndiGo and travel commerce platform Travelport on Thursday officially launched their partnership for distribution of the budget carrier's fares and ancillary products to the portal's customers across 180 countries.

National carrier Air India, Vistara and SpiceJet are among other airlines that already have a tie-up with Travelport.

IndiGo in September had announced the signing of its strategic partnership with Travelport to distribute its low fares and ancillaries to all connected Travelport travel agencies around the world - both online and offline. "We are very excited to officially launch our content on the travel commerce Platform today and proud of our partnership with Travelport. Travelport's technology is providing an opportunity for us to reach new travellers at home and internationally," IndiGo President and Whole-time Director Aditya Ghosh said.

The Travelport platform offers fully-integrated, industry-leading merchandising capabilities and is used extensively by travel agencies in India as well as other key target markets for IndiGo. PTI

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group said on Thursday it has secured land to build a A$300 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

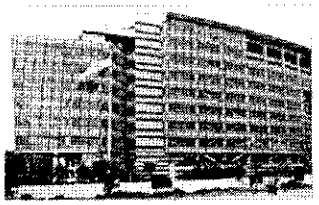
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 210,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the U.S. carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire . "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue." Seshagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.9 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBIT) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.89 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus estimate downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group said on Thursday it has secured land to build a $300 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long-delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

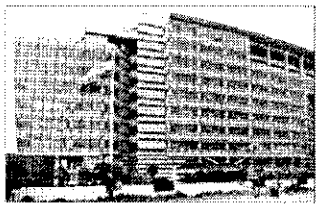
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 21,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California in this year-end - its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the US carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, said Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire. "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue," Seshagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Groups on Thursday it has secured land to build a A$220 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long-delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

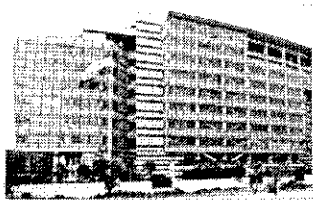
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 200,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the U.S. carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire . "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue." Soshaigiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.9 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBIT) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.89 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus estimate downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.9 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBIT) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.89 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus enhancements downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

IndiGo boards Travelport for fare, product distribution

New Delhi, Nov 24: Domestic airline IndiGo and travel commerce platform Travelport on Thursday officially launched their partnership for distribution of the budget carrier's fares and ancillary products to the portal's customers across 180 countries.

"We are very excited to officially launch our content on the travel commerce Platform today and proud of our partnership with Travelport. Travelport's technology is providing an opportunity for us to reach new travellers at home and internationally," IndiGo President and Whole-time Director Aditya Ghosh said.

The Travelport platform offers fully-integrated, industry-leading merchandising capabilities and is used extensively by travel agencies in India as well as other key target markets for IndiGo. PTI

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group said on Thursday it has secured land to build a A$300 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

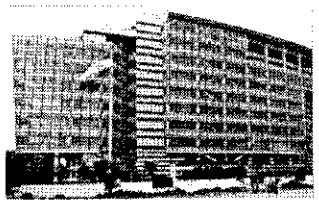
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 230,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the U.S. carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire . "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue." Seshagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country.

Thyssenkrupp profit drop highlights steel merger need

Germany, Nov 24: German industrial company Thyssenkrupp reported a 12% fall in annual operating profit and gave a cautious outlook that underlined the urgency of finding a lasting solution for its struggling steel business.

Backed by activist investor Cevian, which has increased its stake this year to almost 20%, Thyssenkrupp is striving to merge its European steel operations with those of India's Tata Steel to combat overcapacity in the industry.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division, which accounts for about a fifth of overall sales, reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September, despite a rally in steel prices toward the end of the period.

"The large fluctuations in raw materials markets show that we must pursue our transformation into a strong industrial group," chief executive Heinrich Hiesinger told a news conference at the company's headquarters on Thursday.

Chief financial officer Guido Kerkhoff left open the possibility that Thyssenkrupp could keep a majority of the European steel business, telling analysts that the key issue was not its ultimate ownership but removing overcapacity.

"The most important thing for us is that by a consolidation and by the underlying plan we can address the issues of overcapacity," he told a call with analysts, adding that a listing would also not resolve the capacity problem.

Thyssenkrupp's Steel Europe division reported a 36% drop in adjusted operating profit for the year to the end of September

He said the company had never stated whether the steel business would be consolidated or not, or what percentage ownership it might consider, declining to elaborate further at this point.

Shares in Thyssenkrupp, which have outperformed the German blue-chip index by 20 percent this year on hopes of steel consolidation, fell as much as 2.9 percent in early trading to be the worst performer in the DAX.

Thyssenkrupp - whose other businesses include elevators, car parts, submarines, plant engineering and metals distribution - said annual adjusted earnings before interest and tax (EBIT) fell to 1.47 billion euros ($1.55 billion).

The Essen-based company forecast a recovery to 1.7 billion euros for the current fiscal year starting in October but that fell short of average analyst expectations of 1.89 billion euros, according to a Reuters poll.

"Thyssenkrupp management are known to provide conservative initial guidance and we do not expect material consensus estimate downgrades," wrote Jefferies analyst Seth Rosenfeld, who rates Thyssenkrupp "buy".

Adani aims to build 1,500 MW of solar plants in Australia

Nov 24: Adani Group said on Thursday that it has secured land to build a A$200 million ($148 million) solar farm in Australia, the first part of a five-year drive to construct 1,500 megawatts of solar energy plants in the country.

The solar push comes as Adani continues to battle opposition to its plans to build a $7 billion coal mine in Australia, a project that has been long delayed due to a string of environmental lawsuits.

Adani, India's biggest solar power producer and top coal-fired generator, said it would build a 100-200 MW solar farm in Moranbah in the east of Australia, one of the towns worst hit by the global slump in coal mining over the past four years.

Construction is due to begin in mid-2017 and is expected to take about a year.

One of the green groups that has long fought Adani's planned Carmichael coal mine welcomed its expansion into solar power in Australia.

"This is a sensible move that recognises the long term future of electricity production is in renewables," Mackay Conservation Group coordinator Peter McCallum said in an emailed statement.

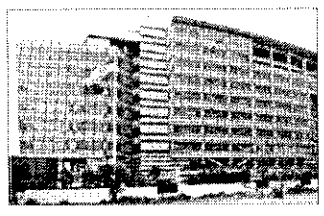
JSW plans to make electric cars

New Delhi, Nov 24



INDIAN billionaire Sajjan Jindal's steel-to-power JSW Group plans to diversify into electric car manufacturing, two sources told Reuters, as Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government boosts support for non-polluting vehicles.

Electric vehicles that use expensive batteries have failed to take off in cost-conscious and power-deficient India, despite enjoying incentives like low taxes from the government that has set a goal of raising the number of such vehicles to up to 7 million units by 2020, from just around 2,000 now.

But debt-laden JSW believes government help - as promised by transport minister Nitin Gadkari on a visit to US electric car maker Tesla Motors' factory near California this year - and its own supply of steel can make its cars more competitive, said one of the sources with knowledge of the matter.

Mahindra and Mahindra is the only Indian firm that makes electric cars, but sales have been softer than expected. JSW's electric car plans have been endorsed by Gadkari, said the source. Gadkari, in his US visit, offered to help Tesla set up plants in India and seek local partners, according to a statement from his ministry.

Gadkari could not be reached for comment.

Another source close to JSW said the company was "aiming for technology like Tesla" but declined to say if a tie-up with the U.S. carmaker was on the cards. Tesla could not be reached for comment outside regular U.S. business hours.

JSW has already set up a team of around eight officials working on the car project for the past few months, and Jindal has interviewed a handful of Indian-born automobile executives to head the division, including one official with Nissan in Japan, said the first source.

The CEO of the division is likely to start in the next fiscal year and further details will be worked out after that, according to the source.

"JSW wants to become a diversified player like the Tatas," the source said, referring to the $100-billion steel-to-software Tata empire . "For Jindal this is a serious business. Money is not an issue." Seshagiri Rao, finance head of the JSW Group that is one of India's most indebted conglomerates, said he did "not want to comment at this stage". The second source said JSW had also been talking to officials at the heavy industries ministry about setting up charging stations across the country

IndiGo boards Travelport for fare, product distribution

New Delhi, Nov 24: Domestic airline IndiGo and travel commerce platform Travelport on Thursday officially launched their partnership for distribution of the budget carrier's fares and ancillary products to the portal's customers across 180 countries.

National carrier Air India, Vistara and SpiceJet are among other airlines that already have a tie-up with Travelport.

IndiGo in September had announced the signing of its strategic partnership with Travelport to distribute its low fares and ancillaries to all connected Travelport travel agencies around the world - both online and offline. "We are very excited to officially launch our content on the travel commerce Platform today and proud of our partnership with Travelport. Travelport's technology is providing an opportunity for us to reach new travellers at home and internationally," IndiGo President and Whole-time Director Aditya Ghosh said.

The Travelport platform offers fully-integrated, industry-leading merchandising capabilities and is used extensively by travel agencies in India as well as other key target markets for IndiGo. PTI
