

EXPERTS CALL FOR USE OF TECH, AI NOT JUST AS COST-SAVING TOOLS

Metal-less day for India's Cannes Lions campaign

CHRISTINA MONIZ
Mumbai, June 24

INDIAN CONTINGENT'S STALLY of metals remained unchanged at five on day three of the Cannes Lions International Festival of Creativity. The tally of shortlists though climbed to 24 with entries in categories like film, creative strategy and sustainable development goals.

Though Indian agencies got off to a decent start on day one, the next couple of days have been nowhere near the success of 2025 when the country's contingent had already picked up 26 Lions by the third day. While the lower number of entries is one reason for India's relatively subdued performance, experts say the time has now come for the advertising industry to use technology and AI as more than just cost and time saving tools.

"Most Indian shops have adopted AI for execution. Faster production, quicker iterations and cheaper visuals. That is the easy layer, and almost everyone is there. What global leaders are doing is building proprietary AI systems and data infrastructure that produce a structural creative advantage. The global winners at Cannes this year are using AI to find cultural insights at scale," observed Ambika Sharma, founder and chief strategist, Pulp Strategy.

Leading advertising firms today own the audience and cultural signal data that offers insights competitors cannot see. Sharma says that India either outsources this or skips it.

That said, experts agree that the country has a clear edge in its advertising that cannot be manufactured – cultural depth. The industry has excelled in cultural insight and human-centred creativity.

The most celebrated Cannes work this year has been the creation of unique consumer experiences and behaviours. Experts say that Indian advertising will need to move in this direction to continue to shine globally in the future.

Ghana's 'magic' trick hot fan topic in draw against England

SANDIP G
Boston, June 24

WHEN HARRY KANE missed a rebound deep into the stands in the dying moments of the goalless draw against Ghana, an England fan turned to a Ghanaian neighbour and quipped: "Oh, the spell is working after all." The Ghana supporter retorted: "No spell friend, he needs some shooting practice."

The banter was about a claim made before the match by Nana Kwaku Bonsam -- whose name translates as Devil of Wednesday -- a Ghanaian witch doctor who told the Daily Star he had cast black magic (juju) on Kane. He had credentials of a sort: in 2014, he claimed to have engineered a knee injury that threatened Cristiano Ronaldo's participation in the World Cup ahead of Portugal's clash with Ghana.

"I am working on Harry Kane," he said. "I have shown what I am capable of before so I know what work I must do to stop him." He added, with some care: "I am not wishing him serious injury. It will be just enough to stop him against my country."

Bonsam is not an ordinary witch doctor, if the category permits degrees. He once contested in a parliamentary election. He built a following during years spent in New York's Bronx, which has a sizable Ghanaian population. Hundreds welcomed him at Kumasi Airport when he returned home. He drives a Cadillac, wears Dolce and Gabbana tracksuits, has 14 children, a cattle farm, a chain of shrines and schools, and has lived in New York, Amsterdam and Berlin. The New York Times profiled him a decade ago, describing him as "a traditional priest loved and despised for his spiritual power."

Back in Ghana, juju is spoken of in graver tones. "Some sections take it seriously, even highly educated people," says Joseph, the Ghanaian fan in the stands. "Whenever we perform badly, they believe someone has done something. When we do well again, some people would say we have done something and that's why we are winning. I don't believe in any of these. Most of us don't."

"In Europe, people don't understand that there is something behind it," former Morocco coach Herve Renard said afterwards. "Was the towel charmed? In Africa, these are beliefs, and everyone is free to believe what they want."

On Tuesday, the banter in the stands continued through the second half. The England fan nudged his Ghanaian neighbour: "Can you teach us some? We want to do magic on our opponents!"

Joseph played along: "500 pounds for a session! Deal? It is not easy brother!"

Another England supporter: "With that money, we could come to Ghana and learn."

When Nico O'Reilly hit the post, the Englishman asked: "You didn't spare Nico either?"

After the game, Declan Rice said, with a grin: "Credit to Ghana, they defended well. We tried everything. Shots, headers, set-pieces... nothing worked. I don't know... maybe the black magic was working!"

Cannes: From what's best to what's next

■ JITENDER DABAS
CEO, BBDO GROUP, INDIA

THE NIGHTS HERE celebrate what was. The days debate what's coming. Somewhere in between, the future of marketing is getting written.

Day three. Cannes Lions 2026. I started the morning the way many people here probably did -- overwhelmed by the schedule. Before I even landed in Cannes, I'd used Copilot 365 to sort through my emails and pull out every invite and registered session. Then I asked Claude to scan the festival programme and build me a personalised calendar around the themes I wanted to follow. Both generated daily schedules, complete with reminders.

In a small way, AI got to Cannes before I did. And once I arrived, AI seemed to be everywhere. Not just as a topic, but as a presence. On screens. In session titles. In conversations. In the nervous energy of an industry that knows something fundamental is changing.

But what stayed with me this morning wasn't AI. It was a walk. Heading towards the Palais, I found myself looking left at the beach and all the banners on the hotels on the right side. What I saw wasn't a coastline. It was a map of the industry's new power structure. Spotify Beach. Google Beach. Meta Beach. Pinterest Manifest. Reddit. Microsoft. TikTok. Amazon. Salesforce. Canva. Creator platforms. AI start-ups. Ad-tech companies I had never heard of before.

At one point I stopped and thought: is this still a creativity festival, or a technology conference with a very good dress code? And when did this happen? Gradually, then at once, the beach became as important as the Palais. Which led me to a thought: There are, I've decided, two Cannes happening simultaneously this week. Like two operating systems running on the same device.

The first Cannes belongs to the mornings and the day. It lives on the beaches, in the cabanas, across the seafront stages. It is loud and future-facing and slightly breathless. The conversations are about AI, the creator economy, where platforms are going, what consumers want next, how marketing gets built from here. The companies driving these conversations aren't primarily here to win awards. They're here to recruit, to launch, to influence, to be seen as the people defining what comes next.

The second Cannes belongs to the evenings and the night. It moves inside, into the Palais, onto the main stages where Lions are handed out and the room fills with the particular electricity of an industry celebrating itself. This is the Cannes we have grown up knowing. The Cannes that borrows from the film award nights. Shortlists. Standing ovations. The question everyone is really asking: what was the best work we made this year? We love that Cannes.

But increasingly, Cannes also resembles CES (Consumer Electronics Show), Mobile World Congress or Google I/O -- gatherings focussed not on who was best, but on what's next. What's interesting is that while Cannes spends its days discussing the future, we still evaluate it largely through the lens of the night.

NCERT warns against fake books

THE NCERT ON Wednesday warned students, parents and teachers against pirated and unauthorised versions of its textbooks, saying a fake Class 9 social science book is being circulated on social media and messaging platforms.

National Council of Educational Research and Training (NCERT) said it has come to notice that pirated and unauthorised copies of certain textbooks are being circulated in both print and digital formats, in some cases even prior to their official publication and release by the Council. -- PTI
